The company's present stuffing place in Jersey City is only temporary. It was built to make experiments in, and it is said that the experiments were all successful. It is a two story frame building perpetually locked, and no one is ever seen going in and out except the watchman or occasionally an officer of the company. A Sun reporter went through the place the other day. The little hallway was profusely decorated with signs, which read, "Positively no admittance to the fattening room." The place resembled a barn and smelled like a hennery. The fattening room and feed store room took up the whole first floor. The stock of poultry which had been experimented on had already been served on the tables of hotels in this city, and only the strong smell remained. There were four windows in the fattening room, but they were all darkened by broad shutters, and the place was as dark as pitch.

The stuffing process was looked into by the reporter with the aid of a candle. There were four revolving cylinders in the room filled with little boxes built in tiers. Each box represented seating or roosting capacity for one fowl. There were twenty-five boxes in a tier and fourteen tiers on a cylinder, making a total of 1,450 roosts on the four cylinders. Each box was seven inches wide, eighteen inches high, and two feet long. The boxes slanted toward the center of the cylinder, and in the rear of each was a wire network. There is room enough in a box for a fowl to get in or out, but not room enough to turn around, and the reason the place is kept dark is to deceive the fowls into believing it is night and thus make them contented with their roosts.

In front of each cylinder is a zinc trough about three feet long, and in that is the machinery by which the fowl is forced to take its food whether it wants to or not. The trough is arranged between two poles, and can be hoisted from the lowest to the highest tier by means of a rope and a cog pulley that enables it to rest at any tier. There is a platform below the trough just large enough for a man to stand on and operate the machine. The machinery itself consists of a suction pump, three inches in diameter, set solid in the bottom of the trough. It is operated with a pedal, like the machines the harnessmakers have for driving rivets into leather. A tin pipe extends from the suction up to the top of the trough, and on the end of this is fastened a piece of rubber hose about as big as a cigarette and about six inches long. This just reaches from the trough to the entrance of the box in the cylinder, and as the cylinder revolves each box is brought in front of the trough.

The food is put into the trough in liquid form. As the box is brought in front of the trough the man who operates the machine catches the occupant just behind the bill with the thumb and forefinger of one hand. A little pinch makes the fowl opens its mouth, and the rubber hose is forced down its throat with the other hand. One step on the pedal forces the food up through the pipe and hose, and down again into the fowl's stomach, filling it chock full. The whole operation takes exactly ten seconds, and an experienced handler can pump full of food 340 fowls an hour.

When asked whether the fowls enjoyed having their food fired into them in such an unceremonious manner, the man who was explaining the operation to the reporter said he thought they did after they got used to it. "For the first two or three days after they are put into the boxes," he said, "it makes them kind of sick to their stomach, and they don't like it. The machine throws it too far down, though, for them to get rid of it, and they have to stand it. They get three square meals a day forced into them, and, with a little practice, they get along all right. After a week or two there is no question about their liking it, and the handler has to take care, or when he is filling the fowls on one tier those on the tier above will peck his eyes out in their anxiety to get at the food."

The food room is a store room fitted with a patent food mixer, which works on the principle of an egg beater. The food the first week consists of buttermilk and water thickened a little with buckwheat or corn meal. The second week the water is dropped and cream is put in in place of it. More cream is added the third week, and the mixture is then half cream, half buttermilk and twice the quantity of meal as was used the first week. Into each trough of food is dumped three-quarters of a bucketful of some preparation which Mr. Williams mixes in his private office up stairs. What it contains no one at the hennery ever found out. It looks like water. It makes the fowls hungry, the reporter's informant said, and he intimated that it served the purpose of making them fat.

When the experiments were being made, out of 1,400 fowls fourteen died the first day under the treatment, and after that an average of three a day. This average is considered very low by those interested in the method, and the enormous profit which is made on those that live a good deal more than makes up for the loss by death.

One hundred pounds of chickens, after three weeks' treatment, weighed 140 pounds. The chickens cost three cents a pound in the west, and a fraction more than that delivered in Jersey City. They sold at wholesale in the market at fifteen cents a pound, making a total profit of about twelve cents a pound without allowing, of course, for the cost of the food, killing and preparing for the market. Allowing for that, there was a net profit of from eight to ten cents per pound.

The meat of a chicken that has been treated is said to be well flavored and nearly all white. The bones are tender and can be easily broken between the fingers. Not having any chance to exercise, no fat is run off, and the meat is bound to get soft if treated long enough. Weak fowl, it is said, cannot stand the treatment, and an effort is always made to pick them out and sell them without being treated. The company will build another hennery, or stuffing factory, on the block bounded by Provost, Fourteenth, Fifteenth and Barnum streets, adjoining the present place, and if successful will establish branches in Boston, Chicago and other large cities. A meeting will be held the latter part of the week, and then the stuffing house will be filled with chickens and pumping will be begun.—New York Sun.

Anæmia.

A condition of anæmia, or lack of blood, occurs in the course of many acute and chronic diseases, and, under such circumstances, is of importance only in connection with the special disorder which it accompanies. But what of the many persons who are evidently "poor blooded," and yet have no other known physical infirmity? This condition is seen in all degrees of severity, from the simple anæmia resulting from a slight failure in the assimilation of food up to the well nigh incurable disease called pernicious anæmia.

A form of the disease called chlorosis, or green sickness, which gets its name from the sickly greenish hue of the skin, is not unfrequently seen; it occurs especially in young women who have too much indoor life and too little exercise.

Several theories have been brought forward by eminent medical gentlemen to explain the affection. One authority ascribes it to the imperfect development of the heart and blood making organs; another thinks it is due to the inability of the formative tissues to meet the demands of the growing organism; still a third believes it to result from a lack of iron in a form suitable for assimilation.

Sir Andrew Clark, the eminent London physician, believes that in the majority of cases the whole trouble results from the absorption into the system of poisonous alkaloids, which are formed during the decomposition of the contents of the digestive tract. It has been calculated that sufficient poison is formed in the process of decomposition in the intestines of a healthy man during twenty-four hours to cause death if retained and absorbed.

If such alkaloids are mixed with the blood, there is every opportunity for them to exert their baleful influence upon the tissues into which they are carried. A lack of attention to the regular and complete evacuation of the bowels is quite sufficient to account not only for this special series of maladies, but for many slighter ailments, and it has been found that the surest method of treatment in these cases is such a course of diet and laxatives as shall correct this irregular habit.—Youth's Companion.

Her Wish Gratified.

"You'd better not wish for the impossible," said an Irish-tongued gentleman to a friend who, in a fit of depression, had wished she had died in her cradle. "You may get it!" One might apply the same stricture to wishing for the possible when its attainment would not be altogether pleasant.

Last summer, says The London Graphic, two ladies staying in India drove in a bullock tonga to see the view from a neighboring hill. The prospect of the thick jungle, stretching away for hundreds of miles, naturally suggested the idea of game, and one of them said:

"How I should like to see a real, live tiger just once in his native glen."

The sun was beginning to sink as they started to drive homeward by an unfrequented track cleared through the jungle. Soon they came to an open space, and there, "All at once," writes one of them, "on looking up, I saw what I at first thought to be the stump of a felled tree about thirty yards off the roadway. As we drew a little nearer I saw it was moving.

"'Look!' I said to my friend. 'It's a panther!'

"Fortunately, the bullocks did not scent him, or they would have bolted and probably upset the tonga, leaving us at the tender mercy of the beast. As we were passing him he left the tree under which he had been standing, and came toward us in a crouching manner, as if making ready for a spring. We then saw it was a tiger, and a very fine one.

"To say we were frightened would not be wide of the mark, especially as he moved parallel with us for about twenty yards, keeping his eye upon us the whole time, and looking as if determined to have at least one of us for a meal. The driver whipped up his bullocks, we shouted, and one of us opened and shut a white umbrella. This apparently frightened the tiger, who disappeared into the bush."

Nervousness in Horses.

There is one respect in which all the most distinguished trotters have resembled each other, and that is in their nervous energy, in high spirit and courage. That flame which the Washington Hollow horseman detected in the eye of Flora Temple came out afterward in the resolute burst of speed with which she finished her fast miles. Dexter was represented as being "chock full of fire and devilry," and capable of jumping like a cat. Hiram Woodruff spoke of his "wicked head." Goldsmith Maid had a strong will of her own, and the excitement she betrayed on the eve of a race showed how fine was her organization. "She would stand quietly enough," says her driver, "while being hitched to the sulky, although she had been previously kicking and plunging in her stall, but she would shake and tremble until I have heard her feet make the same noise against the hard ground that a person's teeth will when the body is suddenly chilled; that is, her feet actually chattered on the ground.

"The instant I would get into the sulky all this would pass away, and she would start in a walk for the track as sober as any old horse you ever saw." Rarus was so nervous that he never could have been driven with safety on the road, and his courage was of the finest temper. St. Julian was exceedingly high strung, and in hands less patient and discreet than those of his trainer might never have been subdued to the purpose of racing. Jay-Eye-See, though I know less of his personal history, is notorious for the pluck he showed on the last quarters of his hard miles, and Maud S. is the most spirited, the most determined and at the same time the gentlest of animals.—H. C. Merwin in Atlantic Monthly

How He Resembled Flannel.

There have been a few, a very few, extremely High Church Episcopal clergymen in this country who appeared to think that a studied neglect of the bath was a mark of Catholic orthodoxy. One of these excellent men, who was well known in this city a few years ago, was generally arrayed in a coarse cassock that had long ceased to be even approximately clean, and in linen that was simply dirty—that is the only word that can be used. His finger nails were in mourning, and altogether he was a good reproduction of a mediæval saint—the kind with whom the odor of sanctity was made visibly manifest by the odor of dirt. Strangely enough, he was at the same time a gentleman by birth, education and rearing. He was simply misled by a false ideal of Christianity. But that is not the point. One day two Episcopal clergymen got to talking about him. "What does he remind you of any way?" asked one. "Of flannel," was the reply. "How so?" asked the first. "Oh," answered the second, "because he shrinks so from washing."—New York Tribune.

QUEER CUSTOMS OF BRAZIL.

Peculiarities of Funerals and Weddings.

BURLY PORTERS CARRYING FURNITURE.

There are many curious customs observed by the Brazilians. Funerals are notable in that for a young unmarried lady coffin, hearse and the livery of the driver must be bright scarlet, the four white horses drawing the hearse must be covered with scarlet nets and scarlet plumes must deck the horses' heads. No women go to the cemeteries. The mother, the widow must not exhibit her grief in public.

For the swell funeral of a young girl the coffin, hearse, livery of the driver and nets and plumes for the horses must be royal purple. For elderly persons black and gold are the adornments of mortuary trappings.

At weddings the bride does not wear orange blossoms, but orange flowers are presented by the groom and his bride to their unmarried friends, and they are supposed to pass them on to their unmarried acquaintances. This custom has a hidden meaning dating back to the twilight of man's history. The flower is an emblem of fecundity, and the "passing on" of the gift signifies "Go thou and do likewise."

The calling of porters—the business of porterage—is a regular one, and is divided into classes. There are porters whose specialty is handling pianos—delivering, transferring them. You never see a piano on a truck or in a furniture van. Four men bear upright pianos on their heads, and square and grand pianos are carried in slings suspended from two poles, resting on the shoulders of four men.

Iron safes are transported by porters, delivered from the warehouses, moved from one place to another and put in position—all by sheer strength.

If you buy anything—furniture, a piano, a safe—the purchaser must bargain with the porters for the delivery. And if you do not make your bargain to carry and put in position, the porters will leave the article or articles at your door, unless you agree to pay additional for placing them in your house or rooms.

In the business streets of the city—in the wholesale and warehouse districts—the carros urbanos—a street car line with narrow gauge track—runs up one and down another of the narrow ways, on almost every street. In the coffee districts there are regular freight cars run on these tracks for the transport of coffee in bags to the coffee docks.

The porters who have made their habitat in these streets use hand trucks made to "track" on the street car rails. As you walk along the shady sides of these streets the porters unoccupied are lounging in the doorways or sleeping on their trucks, which partly obstruct the sidewalks. You have to keep a lookout all the time or you will soil the bottoms of your trousers against the grease dripping wheels of these trucks.

The streets in the residence portion of the city are infested day and night with peripatetic venders, peddlers and retailers of fruits, vegetables and, in the summer, of ices. Their discordant cries, clapping of sticks, rat-a-tat on tin or iron pans, make both day and night hideous.

The Brazilians are fond of looking out upon the passers by in the streets. In the mornings and evenings the windows of the houses on the shady sides of the streets are filled with women and children leaning half out. They recognize their acquaintances walking or riding by in the street cars with waves of their hands. Fine places, with grounds in front of the houses, have raised platforms, where the members of the family sit in the evening for the double purpose of enjoying the breeze and watching the passers by.

In the height of the summer season the thermometer in the shade stands for several hours of the daytime at from 85 to 95 deg. In the business part of the city, with its narrow streets, this heat is at times very oppressive, but, except in extraordinary seasons, there is scarcely a day without a breeze, either from the bay and sea or from the mountains, which ameliorates the heat perceptibly. The mornings and evenings are almost invariably fresh and delightful. The temperature of the houses at night depends greatly upon their location. If they are situated so as to catch the breezes from the water or from the mountains there is no trouble in sleeping.

If the sanitary condition of the city was as it should be, Rio would always be perfectly healthy. But the drainage is bad, and there is insufficient water to keep the sewers thoroughly flushed and the streets clean. If Rio had the abundance of water which Paris has, and its drainage system was as perfect, it would be a more healthy city than the French capital. The curse of Rio is a City Improvement company, which has the privilege of sewerage and drainage and all the appliances thereof. The expenditure of $20,000,000 would give Rio a perfect natural drainage, supply an abundance of water and make the tide circulate in all the little coves and bays of the great bay about and on which it is built.—Rio de Janeiro Cor. New York Herald.

Egyptian Cats.

The bronze cats and kittens of Bubastis have never been excelled for truth and suppleness of modeling. As for the cat-headed Basts, so admirably is the head of the intelligent Egyptian tabby adapted to the graceful proportions of the goddess, that we lose our perception of the incongruity and find the combination perfectly natural. The name of the cat in the ancient Egyptian language is mau—a name evidently onomatopoetic, and so affording no clew to the original nationality of the animal, which was certainly unknown to the Egyptians of the Pyramid period. Lenormant remarks with truth that Bast in the time of the ancient empire was invariably represented with the head of a lioness, and that it is only with the advent of the twelfth dynasty that she begins to appear upon the monuments in the likeness of a cat. This was the time of the great raids of the Pharaohs into the land of Kush (Ethiopia); and it is a notable fact that the cat and the Dongolese dog are first represented in the wall paintings of Beni-Hassan during the reigns of the Usertesens and Amenemhats.—Amelia B. Edwards in Century.

The "marble man," the discovery of which all Australia has been ringing, turns out to be a clever fraud instead of an ancient fossil. An impecunious Italian conceived the idea of its production. A slab of marble was obtained from the quarries and cut into something like the shape of a man, and two confederates quietly buried the "fossil" deep in the earth, where they triumphantly found it on the following day. Local credulity was equal to the occasion, and the Italian regarded his "marble man" as a sure fortune, as no doubt it would have turned out to be had not the scruples of one of the confederates led him to confess the fraud.—Detroit Free Press.

Early Rising.

From a very ancient date there has been a class of wiseacres who were unwilling to admit that any good could emanate from those who did not "rise with the lark." These would-be philosophers held mere early rising to be a virtue which covered a multitude of sins, and that early retiring and early rising would make men "healthy, wealthy and wise," despite the fact that milkmen, chimney sweeps and others, who are earliest out of their bed, were never distinguished for these said characteristics or acquirements.

Should one argue that early rising, like cold baths in winter, did not agree with all constitutions, they would refer to the sluggard, or to the early bird, or to some other person or thing having not the least possible relation to our circumstances.

Imagine the comfort (?) of having one of these early rising philosophers as a near neighbor, or perchance a dweller under the same roof, and he not only rising at unreasonable hours, but insisting upon disturbing the "forty morning winks" of the other inmates.

These good people are not aware that they have mistaken a habit for a characteristic, and you could not convince them that it is as often a bad as a good trait. They have never observed that many evil doers are frequently stirring about early in the morning.

If, however, early rising is used by them as an argument for forehandedness, then much that is said may be true; still it is really more important that a man should obtain a sufficient amount of refreshing sleep than that he should rise each morn at a given hour.—Fannie L. Fancher in Housekeeper.

Oysters on Trees.

"Chesapeake bay has the finest kind of oysters," said the Talking Man. "The reason they are sometimes found growing on tree branches is this: The spawn of the oyster floats about in the water, tossed by wind and waves. It has the quality of attaching itself firmly to any solid substance it touches. Sometimes it might be the bottom of a ship, a rock or a tree branch. You know the bottom of a ship often needs scraping on account of the shellfish adhering to it.

"Now, the branches of trees often droop into the water. They do it along the borders of the Chesapeake the same as on the banks of any other river or bay. At high tide such branches will be covered with water, and when the tide goes back the branches come to the surface again.

"The spawn sticks on those boughs when they are beneath the waves. In a few days the tiny oysters begin to develop, and before long at every low tide the branch can be seen hanging out, with little oysters growing all over it.

"Sometimes a branch which is often under water will be nearly covered with small oysters. It looks very odd, of course, but it's a common enough sight down there.

"Grow? They don't grow very large, to be sure. To attain perfection an oyster must always be under water, and these hang half the time out of it. When they are exposed too long to the hot sun they die. Their weight often causes them to fall off."—Harper's Young People.

Who Invented the Cigar?

It is not at all certain that the white race has a prior claim even upon the invention of the cigar. In all parts of New Guinea, the largest island in the world, that have yet been visited, tobacco is cultivated, and in some of these districts the humble pipe contributes nothing to the enjoyment of the weed, and is not even known. Dr. Maclay saw natives with crude looking cigars in their mouths who had never seen a white man before, and thought he had dropped from the sky. Dr. Finsch, who some years later explored the coast for hundreds of miles, says the natives of the whole northeast coast of New Guinea, though inveterate smokers, had never heard of a pipe, and returned those which he gave them as articles for which they had no use. He says they roll the partly dried leaves into a rude cigar, and, not being blessed with Havana wrappers, they tie around their cigar a large green leaf from a tree.

Doubtless the vilest weeds sold on the Bowery are superior to those products of Papuan ingenuity, which hold fire so poorly that a live coal is always kept on hand to revivify them. But they suit the native taste, and the people seem to regard those who draw tobacco smoke through a pipe stem as belonging to an inferior race of human beings.—Goldthwaite's Geographic al Magazine.

Why She Wanted to Know.

Here is one of Marshall P. Wilder's stories: Every time I've started out on one of my reading tours lately I've had a hard time to get to the ticket window of the railway station. There are always a lot of people there who are asking questions. They remind me of an old woman whom I heard of in London who went to a station a little way out of the city and asked when the next train would go to London.

"Twelve-fifteen," said the agent. It was then 9 a. m.

Shortly afterward the woman came again and asked the same question. Same reply.

At 10 o'clock, same question, same answer, and so on at intervals of thirty minutes until 11:30. Then the agent was vexed.

"Madam," said he, "no train will pass this station—express, freight, goods or accommodation, to London or from London—until 12:15."

"Oh," responded the old lady, much relieved, "then I think I'll venture to cross the tracks."

Handshaking.

Those who have made a study of handshaking say that every man shakes hands according to his nature, whether it be timid or aggressive, proud or humble, courteous or churlish, vulgar or refined, sincere or hypocritical, enthusiastic or indifferent. If you only know how, you can tell all about a man by the way he shakes hands. The man who has a hand about the size of a ham and who possesses a vise-like grasp that gathers your digits into its fatal clutch about as a devilfish surrounds its helpless victim is not much more disagreeable to meet than he who

With finger tip he condescends
To touch the fingers of his friends,
As if he feared their palms might brand
Some moral stigma on his hand.

Immense Steel Spring.

The largest steel spring in the world is 310 feet long, 6 inches wide and a quarter of an inch thick. The manufacture of this spring is a remarkable accomplishment in metal working and was successfully undertaken by a Pennsylvania firm, although the principal European iron works had previously refused the order.—New York Recorder.

MONEY IN MANY LANDS.

Peculiarties of Foreign Paper Currency.

THE PLAIN BANK OF ENGLAND NOTE.

China's Picturesque Bank Bills.—A Money Changer's Views.

It was a quaint little old man whom I met some days ago in a little, foreign looking money changer's shop near Bowling Green. He might have played Shylock without making up, with his patriarchal white beard and hair, his keen black eyes and curved nose, but a very amicable and good natured Shylock I found him, with not a suggestion in his manner of any desire to exact even an ounce of flesh for the time I took in asking curious questions about the currencies of all nations. I found the old man peculiarly apt in the information I asked. He had handled money in nearly every capital in Europe.

GOOD AS GOLD EVERYWHERE.

"This," he said, as he picked up a Bank of England note, "is the plainest piece of currency to be found in any country in the world, and it is good for gold in any land under the sun where white men or yellow live."

The Bank of England note is about five inches by eight in dimensions, and is printed in black ink on Irish linen water-lined paper, plain white and with ragged edges, which lacks the oily smoothness of our own bank notes.

"It looks easy enough to counterfeit," remarked my ancient guard, "but, in fact, the Bank of England suffers as little from counterfeiters as any similar institution in the world. The notes are never reissued, but are burned as soon as they come back to the bank, and the paper is made for that sole purpose, and that is the greatest safeguard. In sending a note by mail or express, the note is always cut in two and the halves sent separately.

"The showiest currency to be found outside of China are the notes issued by the Banque de France," he continued, as he picked out a piece of paper that resembled a small show bill. The paper itself is white water lined, printed in blue and black, with numerous mythological and allegorical pictures, and running in denominations from the twenty franc note to the 1,000 franc.

"Not easy to counterfeit, but far from artistic," was the remark of the old man, as he pulled out a variety of Italian notes of all shapes, sizes and colors. The smaller bills—five and ten lire notes—are about the size and shape of our own old twenty-five cent "shinplaster" fractional currency, and printed on white paper in pink, blue and carmine inks, and ornamented with a finely engraved vignette of King Humbert. The larger notes are about the size of our "greenbacks," and are elaborately engraved, but to my eye they are neither beautiful nor artistic. They are worth more away from home than they were a few years ago, though, owing to King Humbert's wise rule.

"But here is your elaborate bank note," continued the old man, as he brought to light a gorgeous piece of paper about 4 inches by 10. It was the hundred ruble note of Russia. The note was barred from top to bottom with all the colors of the rainbow, blended as when thrown through a prism. In the center in bold relief stood a large, finely executed vignette of the Empress Catherine I. This was in black. The other engraving was not at all intricate or elaborate, but was well done in dark and light brown and black inks.

"The Russians look upon that as the height of artistic work," said Shylock, "and it has one merit. The paper is made by a secret process, and the note has never been counterfeited. It is also worth its face value in every capital in Europe and Asia. The smaller Russian notes, the twenty-five and fifty ruble bills, are about one-third smaller and not as gorgeously colored. The smallest denomination in Russian currency is five rubles, about $2.50 in United States currency."

IN TWO LANGUAGES.

"Here is a peculiar bill, but a very good idea, I think," continued the money changer, as he showed me another bill. "This is from Austria, and, like all his majesty Francis Joseph's currency, is in two languages. On one side it is Austrian and on the other Hungarian, for the benefit of the Magyars."

The bill was printed on a light colored thick paper, which showed none of the silk fiber marks or geometric lines used in our currency, as a protection against counterfeiting. But, like the German currency, each bill bears upon it a terrible warning to counterfeiters, threatening the penitentiary confinement "to any one who shall make, sell or have in his possession any counterfeit or facsimile of this bill." The engraving is profuse with angel heads and artistic scroll work. The lowest denomination in currency is the one florin, worth about forty cents of our money. The highest bill is the 1,000 florin note.

The German currency is rather artistic. The bills are printed in green and black upon paper lighter than our own gold certificates, and about an inch wider. They run in denominations from five marks to 1,000 marks. Their later bills are being printed on the silk fiber paper.

The Norwegians have a curious currency, but it is rarely seen here, for the reason that it circulates very little among the common people and the class that comes here as immigrants. These stick to their copper and silver coins and shun the little cinnamon brown bills of their government, which are about the size of our old "shinplasters."

The Chinese paper currency is in red, white and yellow paper, with gilt lettering and gorgeous little hand drawn devices. The bills, to the ordinary financier, might pass for wash checks or prayer papers in a Joss house, but they are worth good money in the Flowery Kingdom. South American currency, in most countries, is about the size and general appearance of our own bills, except that cinnamon brown and slate blue are the prevailing colors and the Spanish and Portuguese languages the prevalent language engraved on the face.—New York Star.

Of the threescore none but old Hugh Williams survived the shock. On the 5th day of August, 1820, a picnicking party on the Thames was run down by a coal barge. Commissioner Raum lost his memory in the pension inquiry. And then he lost his temper. It is very unpleasant to have your memory jogged when you are trying to forget.

A significant portion of the dispatch which reported the anti-Hill meeting at Buffalo said that there were a great many Republicans and ladies in the audience. No doubt.

President Harrison has signed the bill creating the Los Angeles customs district, and giving Los Angeles the privileges of immediate transportation, and it is now a law.

It is a very significant fact that all the Alliance members of the house of representatives except one voted for free wool. This is a pretty plain indication of how the farmers of the northwest feel on that issue.

Judge Hunt, of the superior court of San Francisco, has decided in the case of Robinson vs. the Southern Pacific railway, that the purchase of a first-class ticket entitles the passenger to a stop off at any intermediate point on his way to his destination, and to resume his trip at any time within six months. This is the most important decision in railway matters that has been rendered in this State for years. The case will doubtless be carried to the supreme court.

The nomination of Hon. Frank Coombs to be Minister to Japan is a compliment to California. Mr. Coombs has been much favored by his constituency, and his prominence is due to the confidence they repose in him and the honors they have bestowed upon him. Mr. Coombs is a young man, and while without experience in a position of the character he is now to assume, he is self-respecting and dignified, a man of firmness and clear perception, and the courage essential to the discharge of high trusts.

Of the 170 votes cast in favor of Geary's anti-Chinese bill in the house last week, 159 were democrats and 20 were Republicans. Yet the orators and newspapers of the Republican party tell us that their legislation is always in favor of the workingmen and that they are never so happy as when an opportunity presents itself for them to protect the laborer. Cutting, a Republican representative from California, voted for the bill under protest, because under the new law Chinese merchants will not be allowed to go and come, as at present.

Sir Baden Powell, the special British envoy who was sent over to the United States to arrange for arbitration on the Behring Sea question, is not averse to giving Lord Salisbury a a little "taffy." His announcement that the United States has no man equal in ability to the Tory Marquis ought to secure him a good diplomatic post at the earliest opportunity. Powell, however, seems to have been hypnotized by Blaine, whom he pronounces a great man. It is really a marked concession on the part of the baronet to concede merit of any sort to the blasted Hamericans.

A Republican journal scolds the Eastern Democratic Congressmen for voting against Bland's free coinage bill, but says never a word about the Republicans voting against it. As in times past a large majority of Democrats voted for silver while the great majority of the Republicans voted against it. Notwithstanding this unvarying record, the Democrats have not got an electoral vote, and but one member of Congress from the silver producing States. If the silver men persist in voting the Republican ticket let them look to the Republican party for help in their silver fight.

The Geary Chinese exclusion bill having passed the house of Representatives, the usual protest is heard from the Chinese Ministry, accomanied by threats of retaliation. It probably has its effect upon some of our people who do not stop to reflect that there are not five hundred Americans all told in China. Our people are admitted to that country only at a few ports, and in all of them English influence dominates against that of any other of foreign character. The number of our people who are admitted to the interior of China is scarcely more than a score, outside of a few missionaries. In fact, the restriction applied in China to the incoming of Americans is of a stringent character, scarcely less sweeping and exclusive than that provided for in the Geary bill.

BEST FOOD FOR MEN.

WHAT SOME BRAIN WORKERS EAT IN ORDER TO DO GOOD WORK.

No Hard and Fast Rules Can Be Laid Down for Everybody—Individual Peculiarities Must Determine the Particular Food Needed for Each One.

Whether the old saying that a man's heart is reached through his stomach is or is not a true one, it is a scientific fact that the stomach is a highway to the brain. The exhilarating influence of a good dinner is sometimes shown in brilliant impromptu speeches, without a doubt. The cook is responsible for many of the accidents, the failures and successes of life. Not long ago a well known lawyer in summing up a case acquitted himself so wretchedly that the jury promptly brought in a verdict against his client. The lawyer afterward acknowledged that hot muffins at breakfast were responsible for his having lost the case. They made him irritable and insolent.

Curious to know upon what sort of food men of note do their best work, I recently interviewed some of the lights of the medical profession, law, commerce, theology and society.

Genial Dr. George F. Shrady, President Grant's stanch friend, declares that he must vary his food in order to develop and nourish, separately and collectively, the organs of his body.

"I have an excellent digestion and can take all kinds of food without feeling any discomfort," said he, "but I believe that the brain is most nurtured by sleep and rest. If we gratify our intellectual tastes we are feeding the brain vastly better than by any sort of material food, and consequently obtain better results.

"A friend once had as a patient a young author, who had been recommended to follow a strict diet of pumpkins. On this sort of fare he wrote a novel. Well, the offspring of pumpkins—roasted, boiled and stewed—is still looking for a publisher to launch it on an unsuspecting public!

"No one kind of food exclusively is good for the ordinary man. 'To be healthy, wealthy and wise,' as the old maxim goes, study the likes and dislikes of your stomach and regulate your diet accordingly (as I do) and all will go well."

Judge Roger A. Pryor laughed heartily when told that every briefless lawyer in town was anxious to know whether his spirited speeches might be attributed to squab, lobster or partridge.

"Tell them from me," said Judge Pryor, "that I am extremely fond of birds and dainties generally and that lobster a la Newburg is a toothsome dish I don't despise and that my brain works best when I'm free from indigestion. Tell these young men to follow the old Roman maxim and secure for themselves 'a sound mind in a sound body.'

"Hot breads, salads, ices and sweets form part of my daily menu, and as they give my body strength I am able to do my allotted share of mental labor. The body must first be ministered to by food and exercise, and then the mind will soon be ripe for cultivation. The reason, memory and imagination must each be nourished with the food it requires—logic, law, mathematics, poetry or art. Upon the idiosyncracies and constitutional peculiarities of each man depend the kind of food he assimilates."

Dr. H. P. Loomis thinks men pay too much attention to the specific uses of certain foods.

"Look at the enormous sale of phosphates and so called brain foods," said he. "There is nothing in them. If instead of wondering whether this, that or the other is good for him a man would simply follow the dictates of his own appetite we would be much better off. Nature places a safeguard upon excess by creating the sensation of satiety.

"When I have eaten some rich food that causes me some annoyance I take a horseback ride or other pleasant exercise and rid myself of the ill feeling, and in the future avoid that Welsh rarebit or venison that caused the trouble. Rest is really the best tonic for the brain. In two words I would give this prescription for happiness—'Avoid worry.'"

A prominent member of Sorosis, a really brainy woman, declares that the amount of food people require or think they require is largely a matter of habit. Said she: "It is possible to train the stomach to do with very little or to make its requirements border on the margin of gluttony. When the hunger is satisfied, brain achievements depend upon heredity and environment, and to them must be attributed all success or failure. The gardener who only cares for the blossom of his plant instead of directing his efforts to the root, will have but sorry fruit as a reward. Let mankind look to their physical perfection, and the mental and moral are sure to follow."

The Rev. Dr. Henry Van Dyke, the author and clergyman, believes the brain to be touchingly appreciative of all kindness shown to the stomach, and sullen and unmanageable when the latter is oppressed. At the same time allowance must be made for individual tastes.

"My food," he said, "must be taken at regular intervals and be largely of the farinaceous kind, while yours, possibly, may be taken when and as you chose. A single sandwich of caviar would incapacitate me for several hours. So, I say, be kind to the machinery of the body. After all, the best diet for the brain is a constant variety in the quality and quantity of our intellectual food."

There seems to be no particular edible which holds a magic power over the realm of thought but by selecting food with a view to digestibility. In individual cases the body is aided in performing its various functions, and the brain, with its other organs, is thus enabled to discharge its duties properly as well.—New York Herald.

A Missouri Banking Method.

In Missouri they have little family savings banks in the homes of the people, given by one of the banks of St. Joseph. At stated intervals a representative of the bank comes around with the key, counts the money in the presence of the depositors, takes it away and gives them credit for the amount.—Philadelphia Ledger.

A Mammoth Clock.

A new clock of large proportions is being made for St. Paul's cathedral, in London. Some idea of the size of this clock may be formed when it is known that the hammer which strikes the bell weighs 680 pounds.—New York Journal.

Have you written me yet? If you haven't, wisdom and intelligent ambition suggest that you do so to-day. I propose to you my special, personal attention, I undertake to teach any fairly intelligent person of either sex, who can read and write, and who, after instruction, will work industriously, how to earn Three Thousand Dollars a year in their own localities, wherever they live. I will also furnish the situation or employment, at which you can earn that amount. I charge nothing and receive nothing unless successful, as above. Nothing difficult to learn, or that requires much time. I desire but one person from each district or county. I have already taught, and provided with employment a large number who are making over Three Thousand Dollars a Year, each. All is new, solid, sure. Full particulars Free. After you know all, if you conclude to go no further, not a dollar is to be paid. Address, E. C. ALLEN, Box 420, Augusta, Maine.

$6000.00 a year is being made by John B. Goode in Troy, N. Y., at work for us. Reader, you may not make as much, but we can teach you quickly how to earn from $5 to $10 a day at the start, and more as you go on. Both sexes, all ages, in any part of America, you can earn money at home, giving all your time or spare moments only to the work. All is new. Great pay SURE for every worker. We start you, furnishing everything. EASILY, SPEEDILY learned. PARTICULARS FREE. Address at once, GEORGE STINSON & CO., PORTLAND, MAINE.

It is currently reported that a cablegram has been received at Independence stating that the London parties who propose to buy the soda works and Eastside canal property will start for California to-morrow, and that the transfer will probably be made about the 1st of May.

The big freighting team of Kinsley & Mead arrived from Bishop last Monday on its way from Bishop to Mojave. It had on a heavy load of wool and other freight. This one team saves at least $7,000 a year in cash to the county, and the people show their appreciation of this gain by increasing their orders for freight to come by team. Every dollar paid to them for freight is left to circulate in the county.

There is no danger from whooping cough when Chamberlain's Cough Remedy is freely given. It liquefies the tough, tenacious mucous and and aids in its expectoration. It also lessens the frequency and severity of the paroxysms of coughing, and insures a speedy recovery. There is not the least danger in giving it to children or babies., as it contains no injurious substance. 50 cent bottles for sale by Anniversary Celebralion.

The Odd Fellows' Lodges of Owens Valley will celebrate the seventy-third anniversary of their order at Bishop on Tuesday, April 26th. A basket pic-nic with an extended programme of exercises and games will be given in the grove belonging to Rev. G. W. De La Matyr during the day. A grand ball will be given in Bulpitt's new hall in the evening. By the arrangement of alternating the place of holding the celebration between Bishop and Independence, an opportunity is given for the members of both Lodges to meet in social concourse and exchange neighborly greetings, and it promotes good feeling between the towns. Everybody will be heartily welcomed and cordially entertained by Bishop Lodge No. 332 on that occasion. That the entire affair will be a social success goes without saying.

Severe Accident.

Mrs. Henry Fehrman met with a very severe accident last Saturday evening. She was in Rhine's store looking at goods. In the store is a trap-door which is securely railed on three sides, leaving an opening at the head of the stairs. Mrs. Fehrman, not noticing that the door was raised, missed her footing and fell headlong down the stairs to the bottom of the cellar. She was badly stunned, and a physician was at once sent for. No bones were broken, however, and she is quite likely to survive; but being well along in years, the jar and excitement worked injuries from which it will take a long time to recover.

A New Deal.

Mills, Austin & Co. have entered into an agreement with the Lone Pine Canal Company for the purchase of the Lone Pine Canal. The former Company has a force of thirty-five men and fifteen teams now at work on the extension of the canal. It is now beyond peradventure that water will be carried on to the lands adjoining Lone Pine some time during the coming summer. With this accomplished, a large tract of the finest quality of land will be brought under cultivation, and the town of Lone Pine will be greatly benefited thereby.

A Sure Disbandment.

The news that the miner's Union at Candelaria has disbanded which was at one time denied has been fully confirmed. The San Francisco Report says in order to satisfy the mining companies on this point the late President of the union has written to the President of the Holmes and Mount Diablo mining companies, advising them of the fact and stating that the men are willing to work at $3 per day instead of $3 50, which demanded. The Companies, however, will not resume work until the price of silver warrants.

With customary injustice our local cotemporary says that no practical steps have yet been taken toward a World's Fair exhibit from Inyo county. Not only is this untrue, but space has been secured in the California building for an exhibit from this county, and a considerable sum of money has already been expended to secure an extensive display of native products and curios. Arrangements are also being made to show a large display of Inyo marble and it is expected that at least $25,000 will be spent to advertise this one industry at the Fair.

W. S. Morton got home from the southern country on Wednesday. He went to San Bernardino several months ago with a band of horses and has only just succeeded in disposing of them. The horse market is about at its lowest ebb, the market being glutted with the common class of animals. Breeders should remember that a good horse will sell at any time and should endeavor to raise only the best. There are plenty of good stallions in the county to choose from and it costs no more to raise a good colt than a poor one.

A short time ago copies of proposals for bids for disinterring the remains of the soldiers buried at Camp Independence were received at Independence. A number of proposals were forwarded, and the contract was awarded to O. I. Mairs. As soon as the necessary material can be obtained the work of exhuming the remains will be begun. The bodies will be shipped to San Francisco by express and re-interred in the National cemetery there, where the graves will be properly marked and cared for.

Pat Clinton came up from Cerro Gordo yesterday and returned on to-day's train. He says there are quite a number of chloriders at work there. Also a force of men is employed in the Newtown mine from which thirty tons of ore was shipped recently. New workings are being constantly pushed forward and, this mine is quite likely to develop into a valuable property. Boland has several men to work in the Union mine.

W. O. Meroney and family passed through town to-day on their way to Bishop from Fresno county. They were provided with a tent and camping outfit, and the long journey was made a pleasure trip. Mr. Meroney will go into business at Bishop.

"I have just recovered from a second attack of the grip this year," says Mr. Jas. O. Jones, publisher of the Leader, Mexia, Texas. In the latter case I used Chamberlain's Cough Remedy, and I think with considerable success, only being in bed a little over two days, against ten days for the first attack. The second attack I am satisfied would have been equally as bad as the first but for the use of this remedy, as I had to go to bed in about six hours after being "struck" with it, while in the first case I was able to attend to business about two days before getting "down.'" 50 cent bottles for sale by One Pure Baking Powder.

Like Telling a Secret.

A story is told and it is a true story that over seventy per cent. of all the baking powders sold contain either alum or ammonia, and many of these powders contain both. The ill effects upon the system of food raised by alum or ammonia powders are the more dangerous because of their insidious character. It would be less dangerous for the people were it fatal at once, for then such food would be avoided, but their baneful action because imperceptible at first and slow in its advances, is no less certain.

Dr. Price's Cream Baking Powder is declared by all authorities as free from alum, ammonia or any other adulterant. Its purity has never been questioned, and while it does finer and better work, it costs no more at retail than many of the adulterated powders.

The temper of reformers is enthusiastic, and hence they almost inevitably exaggerate the evils they seek to correct.

DYING IN HARNESS.

Stretched in the broken shafts, and crushed by the heavy load;
Only a fallen horse and a circle of wondering eyes

Hold! for his toil is over; no more labor for him;
See the poor neck outstretched and the patient eyes grow dim;
Thinking, if dumb beasts think, how good it is to be dead;
After the burdened journey, how restful it is to lie
With the broken shafts and the cruel load, waiting only to die!

Watchers, he died in harness, died in the shafts and straps:
Fell, and the great load killed him; one of the day's mishaps,
A toiler dying in harness, heedless of call or goad.

Passers, crowding the pathway, staying your steps awhile,
Was it the symbol? Only death; why should we cease to smile
At death for a beast of burden? On through the busy street
That is ever and ever echoing the tread of the hurrying feet!

What was the sign? A symbol to touch the tireless will,
Does he who taught in parables speak in parables still?
The seed on the rock is wasted, on the heedless hearts of men,
That gather and sow and grasp and lose, labor and sleep, and then:
Then for the prize! A crowd in the street of ever echoing tread.
The toiler, crushed by the heavy load, is there in his harness dead!

—John Boyle O'Reilly

HELD BY INDIANS.

On the 16th day of June, 1867, a small body of Indians appeared to the west of Fort Wallace, and from their maneuvering seemed to be spying out the chances of cutting out the stage station, half a mile from the fort. The station was guarded by four or five men at the time, and the corral held about thirty-five horses. I had just come in that morning from a long scout, and was asleep when the Indians were first seen. As soon as routed out I took two men with me and rode down to the station. We picked up a fourth man there and headed direct for the redskins, who were then a mile away. We were not a quarter of a mile from the station when I became suspicious that it was a plot to draw us away. We brought our horses to a walk, and after getting half a mile from the station we turned to the left as if to circle back. At that moment 300 Cheyenne warriors, led by old Roman Nose, burst out of the dry ravines where they had been lying concealed for two hours and made straight for the station.

The plan would have done credit to a brigadier. About 200 warriors threw themselves between the station and the fort, so as to be ready for any move on the part of the soldiers. Thirty attacked the adobe huts constituting the station. About fifty made for the inclosure where the horses were kept, and the others rode to cut us four off the fort. Only one part of the plan miscarried. The men at the station made such a fight that the Indians could not break in on them. They killed three warriors and wounded seven, while they suffered no loss themselves. They got the horses, partly destroyed three stages, and kept the soldiers off, and the four of us, seeing that escape to the fort was cut off, rode to the west in hopes to outrun our pursuers. Unfortunately for me, I was mounted on my own horse, who had done sixty-five miles the day before and was jaded. For three miles he showed a good leg, but then he began to weaken. We were then on level ground, and I held him up with voice and spur for another mile, or until we had gained a spot covered with outcropping of rock.

Those who wrote about this incident at the time held the three station men up to contempt for deserting me. I did not blame them at all. They were only employes of the stage company. None of them had ever been at close quarters with Indians before, and it would have been strange if they had not been rattled. They were ahead of me as my horse went down, and I do not believe they missed me. Poor fellows! Had the four of us been there in the natural rifle pit among the rocks we could have stood the redskins off in a handsome manner. As it was I was captured, and they were shot down one by one as they continued their flight.

Only thirty-five Indians took up the pursuit. When my horse fell with me fifteen of the warriors remained behind to effect my capture. I rolled into a natural hollow, pulled saddle and blanket off my horse, and then as he struggled up I drove him limping away. It was an unfortunate thing. He was only 30 feet from me when they shot him dead, and as he fell I saw that he was in line with a dry ditch up which the enemy could creep and shelter themselves behind the body. That was just what they did do. They didn't dare charge me, although fifteen to one, but they secured positions from which they could shoot me if I raised my head six inches from the earth, and when I realized that I was helpless I surrendered. There was little formality about it. Among the besiegers I recognized an Indian named Dark Day. I called out that I would surrender, and the fifteen walked in on me.

When an Indian is in luck he is good natured. Those who had pursued my three companions were now returning with their scalps, horses and guns. I had not hurt anybody. Roman Nose had defied the fort and got away with the station horses. There was every reason for rejoicing, and as they formed a circle about me every face wore a smile, and several of them greeted me with a "howdy?" They knew me for a government scout and rider. They knew I had killed three Cheyennes on the Smoky Hill fork only the week before. They knew that I had balked two of their raids on stage stations, and that I had once ridden right through a camp of 200 of them and carried off the best horse Roman Nose ever had.

An Indian sizes a man up according to his deeds. They took my rifle, revolver and knife, but were very respectful about it. I was then mounted on a station horse, my feet tied under his belly, and he was led behind a warrior's pony. They headed to the northwest, and about an hour after dark we came up with the main party, which was encamped in a grove of cottonwood on a small creek. I had no sooner dismounted than I was taken into the presence of Roman Nose. History has said that he was one of the smartest chiefs any western tribe ever had. He was smart only as an Indian. He was a liar, hypocrite and assassin. He had the smartness of a coyote in avoiding a superior force, and the cunning of a serpent in approaching a foe. I knew he could hold a conversation in English, but as he did not know that I was aware of the fact he called up a half breed to act as interpreter. I was pretty well up in the Cheyenne tongue, but Roman Nose did not know it. He began the conversation as follows:

"How many soldiers are there in the fort?"

"About a hundred," I answered, giving him the correct number.

"Why didn't they come out and fight us?"

"They were hoping you would come nearer."

"You are called Night Shadow?"

"Yes."

"You have killed some of my people?"

"After they had sought to kill me."

"Hu! The Indian has a right to defend his own lands. The white man wants everything, even the dry rivers and the bare rocks. In an hour I shall burn you at the stake."

I hadn't the slightest reason to hope he wouldn't. The Cheyennes had an old score to settle with me personally, and their loss of men at the station that day must be avenged. I was turned over to a guard of three warriors, and they gave me something to drink and to eat. I was hungry and thirsty and I made as good a meal as if I expected to live fifty years instead of an hour longer. A stake was driven while I was eating, and before I had finished the warriors had begun collecting brush.

It was written of me by a correspondent at Fort Wallace that Providence saved my life. Soon after the stake had been driven it began to rain. Although the Indian is half animal he dreads the rain, and the storm soon took all the enthusiasm out of my captors. At the same time almost a scout came in with some news, and I was soon told by the half breed that I had been respited. This scout, as afterward appeared, had discovered that the fort had neither cannon nor fortifications, and it was believed that the soldiers were demoralized and would surrender if attacked. At about midnight, when the rain began to hold up, all but five men set out in the direction of the fort. The five were left to guard me. They did not hesitate to tell me that the fort was to be attacked, and that they were sure of victory.

I slept from midnight to daylight, being staked out at the ankles and having a warrior on each side of me. Soon after daylight my guards were astir, and when breakfast had been prepared my feet were tied together, and I was allowed to sit up and help myself. We were fully twenty miles from the fort, and no news was expected until late in the afternoon. When they asked me what I thought of the chances I answered that Roman Nose would be beaten off, and we argued the matter pro and con without the slightest ill feeling.

What happened at the fort I did not learn for some days afterward. Had Roman Nose made a secret approach to within striking distance and then charged in he would have won a speedy victory. The presence of his force was betrayed at an early date, and the garrison threw up a breastwork from whatever could be had, caught up their horses, and the first charge took all the conceit out of the 300, several being killed or wounded, and the chief himself sustaining a severe wound from a bullet. One charge en masse would have swept every cavalryman off the earth, but it was not made. After an hour of long range firing the redskins withdrew, excusing their cowardice by saying that the evil one had sent men with black faces to blind their eyes. This referred to a few negro soldiers who took a gallant part in the defense.

About 4 o'clock in the afternoon a courier reached us. I knew, as did all the others, long before he reached us, that he had no good news. He told big stories of the prowess of the Cheyennes, but had to admit they were driven off with loss. My guards were directed to report with me at a certain spot on Red Deer creek, about sixteen miles away, to which the main party had resorted after being driven off. When I learned that Roman Nose had been wounded I knew what was in store for me. He would get some small satisfaction for humiliation by putting me to the torture. The courier did not wait to go with us, but rode off to notify a small party which had been sent in another direction.

During the entire day I had been passive, and betrayed no anxiety, telling the guards that I had friends at the fort who would pay the chief a big ransom for me. This lulled their vigilance and they treated me more as a guest than a prisoner. Another friend had been working in my interest during the day, but I did not discover it until an hour before the courier arrived. A bottle of whisky had in some manner come into possession of the guards. The bottle was kept out of sight, and it was only when their demeanor betrayed them that I knew what they had been up to. None of them was drunk, but all were happy and quite good natured.

It was after 5 o'clock before we were ready to set out. The five ponies and the station horse were brought up and bridled and saddled. This work was done by three of the warriors, while the other two were gambling for a blanket. I sat about ten feet away from them. There had been no time since noon when I could not have cast off my bonds at will. There had been no opening for escape, but one was made now in a manner totally unexpected.

The two gamblers got into a dispute and the three warriors approached to quiet them. Some one was struck, and this led to quite a row. The instant it began I cast off the thongs, whirled about, and at one jump I was beside a pony. Five seconds later I was in the saddle and digging his ribs, and I believe I was out of the grove before I was missed. Every horse followed mine, and went to the south as fast as horseflesh ever traveled the plains. Half a dozen shots were fired after me from the grove, but they only added to our speed. The run lasted for ten miles before the pace was decreased, and when night fell I had added six or seven more. Until midnight I kept jogging, bearing to the left to approach the fort from the east. From midnight to daylight I rested, and at sunrise next morning was run on to by a wagon train and escort proceeding to the fort.—New York Sun.

SEEKING FOOD IN THE DESERT.

After informing the unfortunate cripples of our intention to proceed forward until we could find food, that we might not all be lost, and send relief as quickly as it could be obtained, I consigned the fifty-two men, eighty-one loads and ten canoes in charge of Captain Nelson, bade him be of good cheer and, hoisting our loads and boat on our shoulders, we marched away.

No more gloomy spot could have been selected for a camp than that sandy terrace, encompassed by rocks and hemmed in narrowly by those dark woods, which rose from the river's edge to the height of 600 feet, and pent in the never ceasing uproar which was created by the writhing and tortured stream and the twin cataracts which ever rivaled each other's thunder. The imagination shudders at the hapless position of those crippled men, who were doomed to remain inactive, to listen every moment to the awful sound of that irreconcilable fury of wrathful waters, and the monotonous and continuous roar of plunging rivers; to watch the leaping waves coiling and twisting into uprising columns as they ever wrestled for mastery with each other, and were dashed in white fragments of foam far apart by the ceaseless force of driven currents; to gaze at the dark, relentless woods spreading upward and around, standing perpetually fixed in dull green, mourning over past ages, past times and past generations; then think of the night with its palpable blackness; the dead, black shadows of the wooded hills; that eternal sound of fury, that ceaseless boom of the cataracts, the indefinite forms born of nervousness and fearfulness; that misery engendered by loneliness, and creeping sense of abandonment; then will be understood something of the true position of these poor men.

And what of us, trudging up those wooded slopes to gain the crest of the forest upland, to tramp on and on, whither, we knew not, for how long a time we dared not think, seeking for food, with the double responsibility weighing us down for these trustful brave fellows with us, and for those, no less brave and trustful, whom we had left behind at the bottom of the horrible canyon?—Henry M. Stanley in Scribner's.

The Classified Boy.

"You say," said Mr. Brown to his son Jack, "that Mr. Perkins has a son in your school. How old a boy is he?"

"Oh, he's only a young kid, papa."

"About six or seven."

"What is a boy after he is done being a 'young kid?'"

"Oh, then he gets to be a 'kid.'"

"What after that?"

"Well, he's a 'kid' until he gets to be about thirteen, and then he's a 'young feller,' if he's pretty big."

"None but good sized boys can be 'young fellers,' eh?"

"No, sir. Then they stay being young fellers until they're about nineteen, and then they're men."

"Indeed! But how do you class them at the other end of the line? Are they always 'young kids' after they are babies?"

"But when," the father asked, growing more and more curious, "when is a boy supposed to be a 'lad?'"

"We don't have any lads nowadays, sir. We read about 'em in books, but we don't have any. I've always wondered about how old a 'lad' was."

"But you have 'boys,' surely?"

"Oh, yes, sir. They're all boys, of course, until they get to be men. Only these are the different kinds of boys."—Youth's Companion.

Manners.

I make it a point of morality never to find fault with another for his manners. They may be awkward or graceful, blunt or polite, polished or rustic, I care not what they are, if the man means well and acts from honest intentions, without eccentricity or affectation. All men have not the advantages of "good society," as it is called, to school themselves in all its fantastic rules and ceremonies; and if there is any standard of manners, it is well founded on reason and good sense, and not upon these artificial regulations. Manners, like conversation, should be extemporaneous and not studied. I always suspect a man that meets me with the same perpetual smile on his face, the same bending of the body and the same premeditated shake of the hand. Give me the hearty—it may be rough—grip of the hand, the careless nod of recognition, and, when occasion requires, the homely but welcome salutation: "How are you, my old friend?"—New York Ledger.

Bicycling from Chicago to Boston.

There were in New Haven recently two lady bicyclists about twenty years of age, who rode there from Chicago. They are Miss Mortimer and Miss Chace, and they were accompanied by a brother of Miss Mortimer. They made the journey, approximately 1,000 miles, in thirty-one days, averaging about fifty miles a day, resting several days and sightseeing along the way. Both wore divided skirts and rode safety machines. The ladies remained in New Haven several days visiting friends, and then rode to Boston, their ultimate destination. Both are members of the Ladies' Bicycle club of Chicago. They will return home on the cars.—Philadelphia Press.

Popular Libraries.

There is nothing that so arouses an interest in an institution of this kind as a spirited contest over the election of officers. Take the Merchants' Exchange, for instance, or the Commercial Travelers' association; both are stronger and better in every way after the exciting elections they always hold for officers. In Cincinnati one of the institutions of which they are the proudest is the Mercantile library, and the honor of being its president for one year is so highly prized that contests of such friendly fierceness rage that the papers are full of news of the campaign for weeks. Eminent citizens are placed on the rival tickets, and their friends rally to their support. I am told of one case where so ambitious was a wealthy safe-maker to secure the coveted honor that on the day before the election he purchased yearly membership for his 1,200 employes, and they marched to his aid in a solid body the next day. Similar instances, but not quite so extensive, have been frequent, and the result of the agitation is to keep the library constantly before the people, with a result that its membership is constantly swelling, and it is, by reason of its wealth, one of the finest libraries in the country.—Librarian in St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

When a Man Can See 200 Miles.

About 200 miles in every direction is the distance a man can see when standing, on a clear day, on the peak of the highest mountain, say at a height of 26,668 feet, or a little over five miles above the level of the sea. An observer must be at a height of 6,667 feet above sea level to see objects at a distance of 100 miles. The distance in miles at which an object upon the surface of the earth is visible is equal to the square root of one and a half times the height of the observer in feet above the sea level.

Some allowance has to be made for the effect of atmospheric refraction, but as the refraction varies at different heights, and is affected by the various states of the weather, no precisely accurate figures for general purposes can be given. Probably one-fourteenth to one-tenth of the distance given by the formula would have to be deducted, owing to the refraction of the atmosphere.—London Tit-Bits.

TAKEN FOR A CRANK

A semi-fiendish delight often seems to possess people of strong nerves in sneering at those with weak ones. The irritability of the nervous hypochondriac is ridiculed as natural ill temper. The very genuine and distressing symptoms from which he suffers are made light of. "He" or "she is a crank" is the cheerful sort of sympathy with which the nervous invalid meets from the unfeeling and the thoughtless. At the same time no complaint is more defined and real, none has a more easily explainable origin when it is chronic. Imperfect digestion and assimilation are always accompanied by nervous debility and anxiety. Build up the powers of assimilation and digestion with Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, and nervous symptoms, sick headaches and a generally feeble condition of the system are remedied. Remember that fearful ravages are produced by la grippe among weakly, nervous people. Hostetter's Stomach Bitters cures it, and prevents malaria, rheumatism and kidney complaint.

The use of Ely's Cream Balm, a sure cure for Catarrh and Cold in head, is attended with no pain, inconvenience or dread, which can be said of no other remedy.

I feel it my duty to say a few words in regard to Ely's Cream Balm, and I do so entirely without solicitation. I have used it half a year, and have found it to be most admirable. I have suffered from catarrh of the worst kind ever since I was a little boy and I never hoped for cure, but Cream Balm seems to do even that. Many of my acquaintances have used it with excellent results.—Oscar Ostrum, 45 Warren Avenue, Chicago, Ill.

THE FATHER OF MANY ILLS.

Constipation leads to a multitude of physical troubles. It is generally the result of carelessness or indifference to the simplest rule of health. Eugene McKay, of Brantford, Ont., writes:

"I had for several years been a sufferer from constipation, had taken a great many different remedies, some of which did me good for a time, but only for a time, then my trouble came back worse than ever. I was induced by a friend, whom BRANDRETH'S Pills had benefitted, to try them. I did so, taking two each night for a week, then one every night for about six weeks. Since that time I have not experienced the slightest difficulty whatever, and my bowels move regularly every day. I believe firmly that for sluggishness of the bowels and biliousness BRANDRETH'S PILLS are far superior to any other."

"Oh," she exclaimed, "how can you drink beer! It's such bad form." "I know it is," replied the reckless young man. "It's bad form, but good taste."

BEWARE OF OINTMENTS FOR CATARRH THAT CONTAIN MERCURY,

As mercury will surely destroy the sense of smell and completely derange the whole system when entering it through the mucous surfaces. Such articles should never be used except on prescriptions from reputable physicians, as the damage they will do is ten fold to the good you can possibly derive from them. Hall's Catarrh Cure, manufactured by F. J. Cheney & Co., Toledo, O., contains no mercury, and is taken internally, and acts directly upon the blood and mucous surfaces of the system. In buying Hall's Catarrh Cure be sure you get the genuine. It is taken internally, and made in Toledo, Ohio, by F. J. Cheney & Co.

Sold by Druggists, price 75c. per bottle.

AMONG THE DAISIES.

When the buttercups come in the medder an' make it all yeller like gold,
An' the daisies out'n the paster grow white as they slowly unfold,
An' the robin says it is mornin', an' the yeller bird gladdens the sight,
Or the sun overhead says noonday, or the whip poorwill says it is night,
When the breezes softly meander out over the medders which give Back the perfume of spring joinin' summer, oh, then it's a blessin' ter live
An' dream as the hours slip by,
An' deep in the clovers lie
To wait for the dreary rustle o' the brown leaves by an' by.

Oh, folks may call me lazy, an' good for just nothin' at all
But ter lie out in the mowin' lot where the daisies rise and fall
An' nod an' blush a murmurin, "Good for nothin'!"—but just
But when roses borrow a fragrance from the air distil it an' give
It back with a double sweetness, oh, then 'tis a blessin' ter live
Down midst the flowers so dear,
In the summer time o' the year,
For while others are plowin' me under I'm lovin the daisies here.

Yes, I'm penniless maybe, an' holes may laugh in my coats,
But if I've had little for breakfast I'm full o' the magical notes
O' the bobolink an' the sparrow, and I've drank o' the mystical sweet
O' the summer air grown drowsy, an' hid me out o' the heat
In the shade o' the beeches an' maples, when Elves do the bidin' o' men,
Closin' my eyes an' whisperin': "Let them think what they will, an' then Let them wander out over the lea,
With you an' the birds and see

THE WIDOW'S ESCAPE.

Trenton is a little village located in the mountains of north Georgia, where the breezes are always fresh and invigorating. The nearest railroad station is twenty-five miles and the only means of communication with the outside world is furnished by the stage line which carries the mails and passengers three times a week to and from the station.

Trenton is like the average country town. The merchants are not too busy but what they can sit in front of their stores and whittle white pine as they discuss politics and religion—two subjects upon which discussions are never brought to a final close. Another matter in which Trenton did not differ from other villages was that everybody was perfectly familiar with the business of his neighbor. They knew what went on the breakfast table next door, and if a stranger visited the town his business was known to the entire community before the setting of the sun.

I never knew them to be baffled but once. When the stage arrived one Friday evening a middle aged stranger of prepossessing appearance alighted and entered the hotel, followed by his baggage, which consisted of an ordinary traveling trunk. The only inscription that appeared upon the register was J. Doster. No place of residence to indicate who Mr. Doster was or to furnish any clew to his business.

The next day Mr. Doster appeared upon the streets and strolled around for awhile, after which he visited the office of The Trenton Budget, and immediately placed himself upon good terms with the editor by paying for six months' subscription. Mr. Doster was a polished gentleman, and it was not long before he was on quite friendly terms with the editor of The Budget. He had a decided preference for the city dailies, and while the editor was engaged in his labors Mr. Doster would spend several hours each day scanning the columns of the New York and Boston papers.

Every man, woman and child in Trenton inquired of the landlord at the hotel and of the editor who Mr. Doster was, but without gaining any information. Days passed into weeks and weeks into months, and still Mr. Doster lingered, evidently pleased with his surroundings. He had become quite a favorite with the hotel proprietor, and was so useful in fashioning odds and ends in the shape of bric-a-brac for the hotel that he was no longer regarded as a boarder, but an honored guest.

Every afternoon he took long strolls in the woods, and created some interest among the good country people, who wondered why the stranger could find so much delight in tapping rocks with the little hatchet he always carried with him, or picking up such curious looking stones that struck his fancy.

At the expiration of a year the people of Trenton knew no more of Mr. Doster than they did on the day of his arrival in their midst. Some of the more inquisitive had ventured to ask Mr. Doster where he was from, but they met with no success, as Mr. Doster made it a point never to hear a question that related to his past life. He alluded occasionally to mining in California and digging oil wells in Pennsylvania, but further than this no allusion to his former life and habits ever escaped his lips.

The people of Trenton were completely outdone and they looked upon Mr. Doster with suspicious eyes, nearly all of them agreeing that any man who was ashamed to own his native home or to acknowledge his business must be a bad man, and they predicted all manner of evil to befall the mysterious stranger.

About two years after Mr. Doster's arrival in Trenton he found, in one of his evening rambles, traces of gold on the farm of Mrs. Jernigan, a most estimable widow who lived three miles from the village.

Doster kept his own counsel, but made it convenient in a few days to call at the widow's and make her acquaintance, which he found but little trouble in doing, as Doster was handsome and courteous, while the widow had not grown too old to lose all interest in the sterner sex.

Mrs. Jernigan had a valuable farm outside of the prospect of developing a gold mine upon it. Of course she was elated with the idea of increasing her worldly possessions, and as Mr. Doster seemed to be the medium through which she was to develop her new found wealth he rapidly grew in her favor.

The widow furnished the means to erect temporary works and agreed to give Mr. Doster all the help he required to develop the new found mine. He labored faithfully and each day as he called at the widow's house to report his progress the friendship between the two increased, and it soon began to dawn upon the widow's mind that she entertained more than a business interest in the mysterious stranger, while Mr. Doster, though ever courteous and gallant, could not conceal his admiration for the attractive widow.

Mrs. Jernigan's friends cautioned her and did everything in their power to discourage the match, but fate seemed to be against them and gradually but surely the couple was drawn together, and so strong became their affection for each other that friends decided to let love take its course and the two who were most interested take the consequences.

* * * * * *

The marriage day had arrived and the Jernigan household was all astir making the final preparations for the happy event. Mr. Doster had succeeded in convincing the widow that the gold mine was valuable and that it would eventually yield her a handsome fortune.

Notwithstanding Doster had been in the village three years nothing more was known of him now than on the day of his arrival, and having failed to gratify the curiosity of the citizens of Trenton he had not made any friends except the landlord, the editor of The Budget and the Widow Jernigan.

Doster was as sharp as a brier and took the precaution to make a marriage contract with the widow before the consummation of the marriage. By this contract Doster was to have a half interest in the gold mine and all other worldly goods with which the widow was endowed.

The guests had nearly all arrived and the grounds and mansion were ablaze with light. The widow was a lady of exquisite taste and she determined to make this the most brilliant social event that the people of Trenton and vicinity had ever witnessed.

The hour for the ceremony arrived and the couple entered the parlor, the bride looking exceedingly lovely as she leaned upon the strong arm of the handsome and distinguished looking stranger. The minister had proceeded with the ceremony and in his solemn voice said:

"If any one present can show any sufficient cause why this ceremony should not proceed let them now speak or hereafter hold their peace."

"I forbid the bans," said a tall, athletic stranger, entering the room hurriedly and placing his hand upon Doster's shoulder; "I arrest you in the name of the commonwealth of Massachusetts."

The widow shrieked and fell to the floor fainting. The guests were greatly excited and the house was in an uproar. As soon as quiet could be partially restored and the widow removed from the room the stranger who had created the disorder asked for permission to explain his conduct.

"I am a detective," said he, "and have been looking for this man for three years. His name is not Doster, but Henry B. Johns, formerly cashier of a bank in Boston. Three years ago he was found to be over half a million dollars short in his accounts and while an investigation was being made he absconded, choosing this quiet and out of the way place as a safe retreat. While passing through your town last week in search for another criminal I got a glimpse of Johns and hastened back to Massachusetts to get requisition papers for his arrest."

The detective left with his prisoner and the crowd dispersed, having been greatly disappointed in not seeing a marriage, but comforted to some extent by having at last found a clew to the mysterious stranger's history.

Arriving at his hotel Doster asked permission to pack his trunk before departing for his old home in Boston. The detective granted it and stood at the door as Doster began his preparations for the journey. The work was nearly completed when the sharp report of a pistol rang through the room and the lifeless form of the defaulting cashier lay stretched upon the floor weltering in a pool of blood.

Mrs. Jernigan was so humiliated at her narrow escape that she closed her doors to all visitors and as soon as her affairs could be wound up removed to a distant state, where in a quiet retired cottage she is spending her days, and with new faces and new surroundings is endeavoring to forget her experience with the exiled cashier.—R. B. Harrison in Atlanta Constitution.

Described.

"Have you seen Cleopatra's mummy?"

"Yes."

"Is it really beautiful?"

"Well, that depends on what you call beautiful. Did you ever see a dried apple?"

"Yes."

"Well, that's Cleopatra's mummy on a small scale."—Puck.

He Wasn't Taking Any Risks.

Rev. Primrose—What, a fishpole! My son, I hope you are not going out on the river to fish on Sunday.

Urchin—No, siree, you bet I ain't. I've heard o' boys getting drowned who went out on the river to fish on Sunday—I'm goin' to fish from the bank.—Chatter.

Looking Ahead.

"No, my man, this is not mine. It was a twenty dollar bill I lost."

"But it was a twinty dollar bill before I got it changed, sor."

"What did you get it changed for?"

"Och, sure, so the owner could convayniently reward me, sor."—Puck.

The Reason.

Henry—Yes, and he dun me up, too.—Detroit Free Press.

HER HALLOWEEN PARTY.

How Maud Harvey Spent the Mystic Evening.

RITES AND SPELLS OF "AULD SCOTIA."

I NEED not tell you the circumstances that forced me, Maud Harvey, to remain in the country long after other summer visitors had gone. But it was partly in my honor, and altogether because glad of any excuse for hospitality, that Mrs. McGregor gave a Halloween party. I wonder why they call country life dull? To me it seems full of variety. Every occurrence is made much of, so there is always a new interest. And all were interested in this Halloween gathering, from Grandfather and Grandmother McGregor, who became young again in recalling the rites and spells of their Scottish home, to Frank, the hired man, who, whenever he could get a hearing, added his quota from Hengland, while Maggie, the bright eyed Irish girl, would stop on her way to cellar or buttery to tell how the bhoys and girruls did in ould Ireland.

It was a dreary night. One of those exasperating snowstorms covered mud left as a reminder of days of rain. It needed all the brightness of the wood fires that crackled cheerfully in the big fireplaces of the old house. But the guests gathered heedless of roads and weather. I will not introduce you to them—I hate introductions—besides you will never meet them again; suffice it to say, they were bright, pleasant young people, ignoring titles with Quakerlike simplicity, as quietly courteous to Maggie and Frank as to each other, and making up, by native politeness, for any incongruities of dress or manner. Before they came a touching little ceremony took place.

Grandmother called the family to her, and all went up to what they called grandma's room. It was a little nook where she kept her treasures, souvenirs of Scottish friends, relics of the dead, mementoes of the babyhood of children and grandchildren. Unlocking the door, she said in a trembling voice, "You look, father."

THE BRIGHT EYED IRISH GIRL.

"They're a' right, Jean," was the glad answer. Growing here and there in crevices of the room were thick bunches of the common liveforever. Grandma had planted them in the room on midsummer night, one for each child in the home, then locked the door, not to be opened until Halloween, when, as the plant, so should the life of each be for the coming year. Each of the seven bunches was, as Pete declared, "Good for a hundred years, grandma."

When the guests were assembled they were led to the dining room, where a well filled table awaited them. The principal dish was boiled wheat. All day long Maggie had watched that kettle of wheat, not deigning to give her reasons for preparing the really palatable but uncommon fare, but it was known when the pretty daughter of the house drew from her dish a ring.

"Didn't I guess that yourself 'ud get it," said the delighted Maggie, "an ther'll be a purty chap to put it on your finger this very year," whereupon Bertie blushed, and a young farmer near tried to look unconscious, but failed.

Meanwhile the huge, soft, good natured school teacher, whose friendship has been my bane and amusement, tried to give us some Halloween lore. "It comes from the time of the Druids," he said to me in a loud, confidential whisper, intended to draw all to his words. "On that night they used to gather in the forests and on the plains, building great fires, around which they performed terrible rites, sacrifices were offered, and the aid of the true God invoked against the spirits of evil."

FORGOT TO WATER THE HORSE.

"The spirits don't do anything now except decide love affairs," said the irrepressible Pete, the third of the six full grown boys who filled the house with fun and banter. "Maggie, if the spirits don't do something for me I'll annihilate them." For Maggie was the high priestess for the evening in that democratic home.

"Indade, the spirits know you can help yourself. It's only the shy crathurs that need a little help they work for."

After supper all gathered in the kitchen, always the heart of the ideal farmhouse, and the dancing light of the fireplace was voted just the light the spirits loved, so lamps were extinguished. A tub of water was drawn to the center of the room, and laughing, sunbrowned faces emerged dripping from the bath they had taken while trying to catch with their teeth the red apples which bobbed derisively around. Others, with no better success, tried to bite an apple which quivered on the end of a stick hung perpendicularly from the ceiling. At the other end of the stick was fastened a candle, which constantly faced just where the apple ought to be.

Apple seeds were named and counted, apple parings were flung and formed letters on the floor. Nuts were produced, named, placed in pairs before the fire, and left to show by their actions how love fared between the young folk. But they behaved in a fantastic manner, jumping apart where the general sentiment was that they should have kissed, and burning with the bright, even flame of marriage where least expected. Then Grandmother McGregor said there was nothing so reliable as the three dishes. They were prepared, and blindfolded we tried whether we would place our fingers in the empty dish of single life, the full dish of water that foretold marriage or the muddied widowhood.

Then the investigators went in pairs to the garden where they pulled cabbages. As the stalks were long or short, small or large, so should the future mates be. The adhering clay told of the wealth, while the taste of the stalk, bitter or sweet, told of the temper.

"In Hengland we used to go round a bean stack," said Frank, "hand walk three times when the fellow would 'old 'er 'and."

So Maggie was sent, and the tall, fair girl, throwing a wrap around her, went out.

"There, hif I didn't forget to water hold Bess," said Frank, rising hastily.

"WHY, MAUD—MISS HARVEY!"

"You'll come in again and forget her," said Pete.

In a few moments Maggie returned, flushed and confused, yet declaring she had nothing to tell. All evening, however, Frank's face wore a triumphant look that told of some secret understanding.

Some one suggested sowing hempseed. Now, as I had taken part in every trial and had such a mass of contradictory predictions dealt out to me, I felt like making one final and daring experiment, and volunteered to go. Taking my little pail of hempseed, I went out alone into the darkness. The faint light given by the fallen snow made every object appear weird and unnatural. I went to a clump of pines, which seemed a fitting place for the incantation. Scattering the seed, I repeated the words, "Hempseed, I sow thee; hempseed, I sow thee," when slowly there loomed before me a great dark object. Nearer and nearer it came. Was it a spirit or Satan?

I never finished the lines. With a shriek I ran toward the house, hearing a strange sound behind me. Turning a corner I stumbled and was caught by a pair of arms, while a surprised voice said, "Why, Maud—Miss Harvey—what does this mean?" I explained, or tried to; for how could I tell the dignified Will Garnott that by all the laws that govern Holloween in him I had found my fate. While introducing my city visitor to my hosts, trying to keep a grave face in spite of Pete's gleeful pantomime, I noticed the burly teacher entering the room, and felt that I had solved the mystery of my ghostly visitant.

But the clock struck 12, and we knew that it summoned the spirits back to their places, so the guests prepared to depart. Then we realized that other representatives of impish power had been at work—in other words, the boys of the neighborhood. Harness had disappeared, carriage wheels were carried off. Hideous faces grinned from gate posts, lanes were carefully fenced in, gates removed; in fact, a miniature chaos reigned without.

Why have I told you all this so minutely? Can you not guess? Will says he did not come to me of his own volition that night; it was my incantation that drew him. I do not know. I only know that I love—shall always love—the dear old homestead.

PLEASANT E. TODD.

Antiforeign Feeling in France.

France is the latest nation to take up the antiforeign cry and complain that strangers are seizing the birthright of citizens. There are now 180,962 aliens of divers nationalities scattered about the country, so the Chauvinists assert that these foreigners absorb the work which should belong to the natives, or undersell them. Further, the French say that the foreigners make fortunes in France and then go home to spend the money. Belgians are the most numerous, Swiss and Italians holding the second and third places, while Germans stand fourth. Great Britain contributes 5,224 men and 7,503 women to the French population. Besides her hospitality toward aliens, France is remembering that it is just a century since she emancipated her Jewish subjects. Yet, with all the rights of freedom that they enjoy in France, the Gallic Jews only number 68,000—about 1 in 600 of the population.

Mr. Atkinson in America.

At the time of the arrival of H. J. Farmer Atkinson, the British member of parliament for Boston, Lincolnshire, a New York paper said:

It is fairly safe to predict that Mr. Atkinson will give more genuine pleasure to us than any foreign visitor who has come here for many years. When the American Methodists were in England he entertained them. He gave a dinner to the bishops and caused no end of fun by putting one black and then one white bishop all the way around the table. That is a sample of what he can do as a public entertainer.

When Mr. Atkinson reached Washington he verified the prediction by the course he took in the conference. He criticised Rev. Hugh Price Hughes for "aiding a decrepit party," otherwise the English Liberals, and was in turn called on to repel the charge of Rev. Dr. Balmer that the "Tories had ridden to power on a beer barrel."

British Guiana's Contribution.

The Royal Agricultural and Commercial society of British Guiana has decided to hold, under the auspices of the colonial government, a local exposition of its resources, products and industries, preliminary to the exhibit it intends to make at Chicago in 1893. It is believed by the governor and legislative council that such a preliminary exposition will bring out a much larger and more interesting store than they would gather for the World's fair alone. At the close of the local exposition it is the intention to remove the whole affair bodily to Chicago.

A REGIMENTAL MAGPIE.

The Inseperable Pet of the Soldiers.

HOW HE DECORATED THE CAPTAIN'S CHART

An Inveterate Thief.—His Antics Caused his Death.

He was only a magpie, but such a magpie! At first he belonged to a private in a regiment out on the alkali plains of Nevada. Then the company adopted him as its own, and finally from the proprietorship of Company B, he became the regimental magpie, only, instead of the regiment owning him, he owned the regiment. There never was a slicker, more self satisfied beast, and mischief and antics without end were on his programme. He could whistle; he could dance; he could mock anything that sings, and imitate anything that walks; a magpie, you know, doesn't hop, it walks, like a crow or blackbird. On dress parade it would turn out with the regiment, and follow the officer of the day up and down the line with the most dignified strut imaginable. The soldiers could hardly keep straight faces when the bird would scold the colonel as he gave his orders.

Billy—that was his name—would occasionally steal, and only close and constant watching would reveal his hiding places. Sometimes he would succeed in caching his thefts for two or three months before detection followed. Then a couple of quarts of coins, currency, stamps, buttons, pipes, tobacco, cigars, straps, thread, forks, spoons and small trifles would be unearthed. If he caught any one spying upon him he would be as crafty as a fox, and put up all sorts of dodges to throw the detective off the track. He would make false leads, fly off a mile in the sage bush, and then sneak into the fort close to the ground, so that no one might see him.

Finally the regiment was ordered to another post. Billy went along after much protesting and scolding on his part. He knew something was up, and hustled around after his various treasures, which he brought in from every quarter and dumped in a heap in one of the quartermaster's wagons. Some things were recovered which had been missing for over a year. When the troops marched Billy flew alongside, with numerous private excursions and picnic parties all by himself off into the surrounding country, but he was always on hand at meal times and at night.

At San Francisco a ship was taken for Portland, Ore., and Billy came, too. He didn't like it much, and made several trips back and forth between ship and dry land. Chinatown seemed to strike his fancy, but he finally concluded to hold fast to his old friends.

His career came near terminating the second day out. The window of the captain's state room was down and Billy perched on the ledge. He watched the captain picking out the ship's course on the chart and making calculations and entries. After a while the captain walked out and Billy flew in. Everything was handy. He stuck his bill in the ink bottle and took a swallow. It didn't suit his stomach as well as it did his complexion, and he proceeded to wipe his face on the charts. The nibs of his bill made a very good pen and drew beautiful lines, so he tried it with another mouthful. Beeautiful! The chart looked finer than before. He dropped a whole mouthful on the chart and walked in it. Then he walked over the tablecloth and the white counterpane of the captain's berth, and wound up by tipping the ink over, wiping his mouth out with a piece of the log book, and flying off with a pair of silver dividers.

When the captain came in there was blue lightning. The tell tale tracks betrayed the culprit.

The captain grabbed down a loaded shotgun from its brackets over the door, and started on deck swearing that he would kill the magpie on sight. When the soldiers heard his threats fifty of them grabbed their rifles, and threatened to shoot the captain if he harmed Billy. There was danger of mutiny right there, and the officers had sense enough to see it. They pacified the infuriated mariner, and Billy escaped. His end was untimely. Some months later he got to fooling with the mechanism of a breech loading field piece, and the lever fell down on him and smashed his inquisitive head in.—Washington Post.

A Dog Hires a Cab.

Some one, writing to an English paper, tells this story of a clever dog: "You know how much I rush about in hansom cabs," said the narrator, "and Scoti, my collie dog, always goes with me. We travel many miles in a week together in this way, but on one occasion I was walking and missed him. Search was in vain. The crowd was great; traffic drowned the sound of my whistle, and, after waiting a while and looking elsewhere, I returned to my suburban home without my companion, sorrowful, yet hoping that he might find his way back. In about two hours after my arrival a hansom cab drove up to the door and out jumped Scoti. The cabman rang for his fare, and thinking he had somehow captured the runaway, I inquired how and where he found him.

"Oh, sir," said the cabby, "I didn't hail him at all; he hailed me. I was standing close by St. James church, a-looking out for a fare, when in jumps the dog. 'Like his impudence,' says I. So I shouts through the window, but he wouldn't stir. So I gets down and tries to pull him out, and shows him my whip, but he sits still and barks, as much as to say, 'Go on, old man!' As I seizes him by the collar I read his name and address. 'All right, my fine gentleman,' says I, 'I'll drive you where you're wanted, I dare say.' So I shuts the door, and my gentleman settles himself with his head just a-looking out, and I drives on till I stops at this here gate, when out jumps my passenger, a-clearing the door, and walks in as calm as though he'd been a reg'lar fare."—St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

The writer of the "Quiet Observer" column in The Pittsburg Commercial-Gazette recently took up that very seasonable subject—"present making. He said that "a gift that is given because it is the fashion to give something is nothing more than a donation, and where it is given in return for something it becomes mere barter. A gift," he then explained, "is really an expression of the heart, the object given being only an outward expression. Its value does not depend upon the cost of the object, but upon the motive that prompted the giving. A trinket of the smallest intrinsic value will be as highly prized as the most costly if it comes in the proper spirit and received by one who has an interest in the giver. You may have stowed away in some safe place little trifles that have no value save that of mementos, which you will not part with for any price. They recall to your mind some one whom you have loved or whom you greatly admired. Very few of those who are selecting presents now ever think of that, but vie with each other in getting the most costly and the most useless article they can find."

Mme. Bartholdi.

The late Mme. Bartholdi was no ordinary person, and on her ninetieth birthday she looked so full of life and beamed so with mental vigor and heartiness that I wonder she did not live to a hundred. She was left a widow early, and devoted herself to the education of her sons and the stewardship of their paternal properties, which under her management were increased to fortunes. Though so well endowed with the money making faculty, she was a person of a generous disposition and given to hospitality.

In youth she was reputed the handsomest girl in Alsace. As an old woman she was more than handsome. The pure outlines remained, and the fire of the kindest, quickest and most lambent pair of eyes imaginable was never quenched so long as life remained. The son must have had her in his head, as he remembered her in her younger days, when he was sketching the design of the statue of "Liberty Enlightening the World.' It was her idea that Liberty should not be en pate de guimauve, but of a grave and severe aspect. Liberty was the best of all conditions, she used to say, for those who were severe upon themselves, and the worst for the self indulgent.

One never saw a trace of self righteous harshness in the old lady. She was very indulgent toward the erring; but that grace, she said, came with the wide experience of old age. It was a source of enjoyment to her to drive to the Isle of Swans, in the Seine, and look at the reduced copy which was set up there a few years ago of the famous statue which now stands at the entrance of New York harbor. One of her sayings was, "Do not repress badness; crowd it out with good ideas."—London Truth.

A Paris Candle Story.

"Every traveler who stops at a Paris lodging house," laughed a woman the other day, "has a candle story, and here is mine: We were served with two candles every morning, which we never half used up; these would be taken out, however, and fresh ones appear in their places. Knowing that we were being charged for every candle we determined at least to enjoy added illumination, and my husband looked around for a place to hide them during the daily doing up of the apartment. On the top shelf of a cabinet arrangement in a corner stood a large Japanese vase, wide and deep. Up to this Mr. —— climbed, to discover that we had been forestalled, for in its capacious hollow we found seventeen candles, every one burned down perhaps an inch.

"Some former lodger had resented the candle swindle like ourselves, and had put his daily allowance where it would do the proprietor no good. That night a brilliant illumination of nineteen candles, each set in its own grease on the marble top table, gave us something like light. During our stay we hid and accumulated candles, so that we had always enough to read by, and when we left we deposited our overstock in the vase for the benefit of some searching successor."—New York Times.

The Religions of China.

The three great religions of China are Confucianism, Buddhism and Taouism. The bulk of the people are Buddhists rather than Confucianists, and there are millions of infidels. The tomb of Confucius is at Mecca, for many of the Chinese, and they make pilgrimages to it. Confucianism is more a philosophy than a religion. It contains many of the beauties which we suppose to be exclusively the properties of Christianity. The golden rule in a negative form was annunciated by Confucius, and as a system of morality it is beautiful. The Taouists have more superstitions than the Confucianists. They began about the same time as Confucius, their preacher being one Laou-Tsze.

The state religion, in connection with which all these religions come in, is the worship of the emperor, who is the son of heaven and the prophet, priest and king of the people. He worships for them in the temples at Pekin. When the great Temple of Heaven was burned down a shudder ran down the 300,000,000 spines of the great Chinese nation. It was thought that this was a warning from heaven that the emperor should be deposed.—Frank G. Carpenter in National Tribune.

Begging Letters from London.

"Ever since I was abroad," said a well known New Yorker, "I have been pestered with all sorts of begging letters. They are mostly from the managers of English charitable institutions of various descriptions, though some are from private individuals. The former inclose a variety of printed matter illustrating the purposes and work of the institution. The latter are abject appeals of apparently professional begging letter writers, with which London abounds. I was talking with a friend about it and he said he had the same experience for about two years after he had built a fine house here, a description of which and his wealth got into the local papers. He was deluged with begging letters from almost every capital in Europe and especially from London.

"Those people are the worst and most persistent beggars in the world. Fancy an American mailing begging letters to Londoners! I suppose there must be money in it or they wouldn't do it."—New York Herald.

"Bravo."

The intelligent foreigner is highly amused at the indiscriminate way in which English audiences use this word, regardless of the number and sex of the performers whom they wish to applaud. A tenor is, of course, bravo; but a prima donna is brava. More than one male artist can only be bravi, and if there are more ladies than one on the stage, and no man is to be included in the applause, they should be hailed as brave—at least according to Italian grammar.—Notes and Queries.

The art of longevity, all the world over, is a regular life, temperate in all things, with abundance of pure air and water, and freedom from anxiety, care and worry.

BURIAL OF THE BOOTS.

Some Superstitions About Dead Men's Shoes.

PREPARING FOR THE LAST LONG JOURNEY

An Ancient Custom of Burying Shoes with the Dead.

The superstition of the burial of the boots probably survives in England. It is about seventeen years since the writer heard from an old gypsy that when another gypsy was "puvado," or "earthed," a very good pair of boots was placed by him in the grave. The reason was not given; perhaps it was not known. These customs often survive after the cause is forgotten, simply from some feeling that good or bad luck attends their observance or the neglect of it.

Many years since a writer in an article on shoes in The English Magazine stated that "according to an Aryan tradition, the greater part of the way from the land of the living to that of death lay through morasses and vast moors overgrown with ferns and thorns. That the dead might not pass over them barefoot, a pair of shoes was laid with them in the grave."

The shoe was of old in many countries a symbol of life, liberty, or entire personal control. In Ruth we are told that "it was the custom in Israel concerning changing, that a man plucked off his shoe and delivered it to his neighbor." So the bride, who was originally a slave, transferred herself by the symbol of the shoe.

When the Emperor Wladimir made proposals of marriage to the daughter of Ragnald, she replied scornfully that she would not take off her shoes to the son of a slave. Gregory of Tours, in speaking of weddings, says: "The bridegroom, having given a ring to the bride, presents her with a shoe."

As regards the Scandinavian hel-shoe, or hell-shoe, Kelley, in his "Indo-European Folk Lore," tells us that a funeral is still called a dead shoe in the Henneberg district; and the writer already cited adds that in a MS. of the Cotton library, containing an account of Cleveland in Yorkshire in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, there is a passage which illustrates this curious custom. It was quoted by Sir Walter Scott in the notes to "Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border," and runs thus: "When any dieth certaine women sing a song to the dead bodie, reciting the journey that the partye deceased must goe; and they are of beliefe that once in their lives it is goode to give a pair of new shoes to a poor man; forasmuch as before this life they are to pass barefoote through a great lande, full of thorns and furzen—excepte by the meryte of the almes aforesaid they have redeemed the forfeyte—for at the edge of the lande an oulde man shall meet them with the same shoes that were given by the partie when he was lyving, and after he hath shodde them dismisseth them to go through thick and thin without scratch or scalle."

This must be a very agreeable reflection to all gentlemen who have bestowed their old boots on waiters, or ladies who have in like fashion gifted their maids. To be sure, the legend specifies new shoes; but surely a pair of thirty shilling boots only half worn count for as much as a new pair of half a sovereign chaussures. However, if one is to go "through thick and thin without scratch or scalle," it may be just as well to be on the safe side, and give a good new extra stout pair to the gardener for Christmas. For truly the superstitions are strange things, and no one knows what may be in them! There are one or two quaint shoe stories of the olden time which may be of value to the collector.

CUPID IN SHOES.

It befel once in the beginnings of Bohemia that, according to Schafarik ("Slawische Alterthumer," II., p. 423), Libussa, queen of that land, found herself compelled by her council to wed. And the wise men, being consulted, declared that he who was to marry the queen would be found by her favorite horse, who would lead the way till he found a man eating from an iron table, and kneel to him. So the horse went on, and unto a field where a man sat eating a peasant's dinner from a plowshare. This was the farmer Prschemischl. So they covered him with the royal robes and led him to the queen expectant. But ere going he took his shoes of willow wood and placed them in his bosom, and kept them to remind him ever after of his low origin.

It will, of course, at once strike the reader, as it has the learned, that this is a story that would naturally originate in any country where there are iron plowshares, horses, queens and wooden shoes: and, as Schafarik shrewdly suggests, that it was all "a put up job;" since, of course, Prschemischl was already a lover of the queen, the horse was trained to find him and to kneel before him, and, finally, that the plowshare and wooden shoes were the prepared properties of the little drama. The Seven-League boots and the shoes of Peter Schlemihl, which take one over the world at will, have a variation in a pair recorded in another tale.

There was a beautiful and extremely proud damsel, who refused a young man with every conceivable aggravation of the offance, informing him that when she ran after him, and not before, that he might hope to marry her; and at the same time meeting a poor old woman who begged her for a pair of old shoes. To which the proud princess replied:

Shoes here, shoes there;

To which the old woman, who was a witch, grimly uttered, "I'll give thee a pair which"— The rest of the expression was really too unamiable to repeat. Well, the youth and the witch met, and going to the lady's shoemaker, "made him make" a superbly elegant pair of shoes, which were sent to the damsel as a gift. Such a gift! No sooner were they put on than off they started, carrying the princess, maigre elle, over hill and dale. By and by she saw that a man—the man, of course, whom she had refused—was in advance of her. As in the song of the "Cork Leg," "the shoes never stopped, but kept on the pace." And the young man led her to a lonely castle and reasoned with her. And as she had promised to marry him should she ever run after him, and as she had pursued him a whole day, she kept her word. The shoes she sent to the witch filled with gold, and they were wedded, and all went as merry as a thousand grigs in a duck pond.—St. James Gazette.

A Sure Test.

Noted Detective (at friend's house)—This guest of yours, who, you say, came to you with such flattering letters of introduction, is an impostor.

"True; but all the same, he is not what he pretends to be. He claims to be a man of family, a householder, and in business in a small town."

"Yes. Is he not?"

"No, he does not live in any home of his own; he is used to hotels and boarding houses."

"How do you know?"

"Before beginning a meal he wipes his plate off with his napkin."

INDEPENDENCE, CAL.

FRIDAY, APRIL 22 1892

Probably there is no city in the United States where the administration of justice is more peculiar or more open to undue influence than in San Francisco. The action of eight members of the grand jury in asking to be discharged because they saw no chance of bringing in indictments against persons as to whom there is abundant ex parte evidence—which is all that is needed on which to base the action of such a body—was sensational in its confession of the outside pressure which has been brought to bear to secure the immunity of certain conspicuous characters in events which have borne the stamp of corruption. Following upon the heels of the misadventures of Judge Wallace's elisor grand jury, it is calculated to impress the average citizen with the belief that, in California, there are some people who are above the law.

The protest of the Chinese Minister against the passage of restriction laws by Congress is based on the fact that we have treaty compacts with China which these laws contravene. But, if there were no treaties, the Minister of China would still be protesting, though he is not unaware of the fact that China never has, and probably never will, freely admit Americans to her territory. She has maintained rigid exclusion against American citizens, admitting but a few and confining them to narrow bounds.

The logic of the policy of China answers and defeats its protest. The treaty compacts certainly do stand in the way. The passage of the Scott Act was an offense to them, as also will be any similar legislation. There is no defense to be made of such treaty violation, except that it is intended to break down the treaty. The nation, through its representative body, has the supreme power to adopt the method of legislation to that end, and though it is not the procedure that should be employed, unquestionably the sentiment of the people favors the restriction aimed at, even at expense of the treaty.

It is not merely a question of our political relations with China; it is the larger one of protection of our own people from the inevitable results of contact with a non-assimilative race; it is one involving the social standing of the laboring people, and touching the question whether we are to have an aristocracy resting upon a cheap labor basis that is incompatible with the demands upon independent and self-respecting citizenship.

The question is deeply stirring the American people at this moment whether all immigration to this republic should not be tested by its capacity to assimilate with us and be desirable factors in the building of a nation of intelligent and free people.

The name of Governor Pattison of Pennsylvania quite frequently crops up in connection with the Democratic nomination for President, and it is by no means surprising that this should be the case. He is one of the most notable men in public life to-day. He can poll forty or fifty thousand votes in the Keystone State that no other Democrat can command. He has been twice elected governor of that State. The first time the Hon. Chauncy F. Black ran on the same ticket with him for lieutenant governor and was also elected. The second time Mr. Black and all the rest of the Democratic ticket fell away behind, and yet Governor Pattison was again triumphant. He is said to be able to capture every Quaker vote, and the Quakers are a large element in Pennsylvania. Their voting strength has been placed at fifty thousand, although that is an exaggeration. The public and private life of Pattison is spotless. He has administered all the trusts that have been imposed upon him with ability, integrity and firmness. In this respect his record has been in striking contrast with those of Quays and Camerons and Mackeys, who made the politics of Pennsylvania the synonym of corruption for so many years. As the Democratic nominee he might be able to carry his own State. There are not wanting multitudes who think he could do so. He is free to a remarkable degree from any desire to thrust himself upon public attention. In every case in which he has gone before the people the office has sought the man, and not the man the office. Pennsylvania has not gone Democratic in a presidential year since 1856, when her decisive vote elected James Buchanan, her "favorite" son then, as Pattison is now.

WHAT THE BABY WANTED.

Perhaps Parents and Nurses May Learn a Lesson from This Child's Journal.

Dr. Guster gave a German newspaper the brief but pathetic journal of a baby who, after thirteen days in this world, departed, leaving these reflections for our instruction:

First Day—Wonderful, heavenly! At last I am in this beautiful world! Who would have thought it, that one could breathe, freely breathe, and cry out what one thinks? I rejoice particularly in the sunlight and blue sky, in the fresh, pure air with its coolness. If I could only see and feel all this splendor!

Second Day—Oh, this horrible heat! I have been deceived. This air, this water, this light; how entirely different have I imagined it would be. But patience, all will come right by and by. The old woman who cares for me does not seem to understand me.

Fifth Day—Still no solution. If it goes on this way I cannot hold out long. The whole livelong day must I lie buried in feather-cushions so that I can scarcely gasp down a bit of air. Two linen and one flannel binders, a little shirt, a flannel slip, a long cushion filled with feathers in which I am wrapped from head to foot, over this a coverlet filled with feathers, the curtains of my crib drawn to, the room darkened with double curtains, the windows closed, so must I, poor worm, lie from morning till evening. My burning skin is worse off than the hot stove near me, which can at least, as I feel, give off its heat. Oh, that I did know what I shall do. If I cry it brings the old woman with her milk, which increases my misery; if my hands are cold while my brain and skin are burning, she brings a few more wraps. I turn my half closed eyes from side to side seeking help, and my tormentor says "the baby shivers," and really heats the horrible things at the stove. Will no one come to my relief?

Tenth Day—Again a fearful night! I cry, but I am not understood. I must drink, drink and again drink until the stomach overflows. A half hour later they give me something with a horrible taste from a teaspoon. Air, air, pure, cool air, light, water! Shall I then have no help from this world?

Twelfth Day—Yesterday there was a great council of my aunts and cousins. Each one advised a different remedy for my sickness, but all agree that its cause is a cold. Warmth was urgently recommended, and I received a new kind of infant food just discovered and some strengthening wine, which heated my brain yet a little more, so that I was deathly still. My body is wrapped so tightly with the roller that my stomach overflows every time a teaspoonful of anything is given. My feet are forcibly extended and enveloped so I cannot bring them up to relieve the pain, but my feeling is gradually going. Would that all were soon over.

Thirteenth Day—Farewell, thou beautiful world. Thy light and thine air have been denied me, but thither where I go there are no fetters.

Pure Coal.

Much of our English coal is of a somewhat low quality. Not only does it contain slate and other earthy impurities, but also, unfortunately, pyrites, more than one-half of which consists of sulphur. Our coal fields are being worked out with a velocity which produces anxiety in the minds of all who are interested about the future of the country. We cannot afford to waste even the poorest kind of fuel, and the propriety of restricting exportation has repeatedly been urged with powerful arguments. But in the meantime the burning of impure and dirty coal is a source of tribulation to housekeepers and of injury to manufacturers.

A process of Mr. Lubrig's appears to be an improvement upon various previous attempts, renders it possible for colliery owners to clean, and to some extent purify, without great expense, the coal before it is sent away. The system involves a series of operations, in which are included dry separation, breaking, sizing, washing, recovery of sludge, automatic transportation, etc. It is said that the method is already in successful operation in many places, and from a sanitary, no less than from an economic, point of view every one must hope for its success.—London Lancet.

Some Remarkable Pipes.

Mr. N. C. Barney, a retired New York banker, has an interesting collection of pipes. One of them represents the trunk of an old tree, around which are grouped a party of sporting gentlemen with their guns and dogs, enjoying a hunter's meal. One of the members of the party is cleverly shown to be cutting with his jackknife the name N. C. Barney on the trunk of the tree, to commemorate, no doubt, the occasion. Each figure is a correct likeness of an individual member of the party. The owner's name is also carved on each of the game bags, and the delicate network around them is true to nature.

In this collection are also a few pipes that came from Alaska. They were made of walrus tusks by the Eskimos. Another remarkable piece is a cigar holder, on which is carved a Gordon setter, a favorite dog belonging to the owner. It is a perfect image of the dog, and from smoking the meerschaum had acquired a brownish red color, which is exactly the color of the dog.—Collector.

Two Strange Fish.

Two strange fish were taken in a trawl off the coast of Maine recently. One, the lamphis, is the only specimen of the kind ever taken in eastern waters.

In shape it was like a very large sunfish, and its weight was about 300 pounds. Its back was of a beautiful sky blue, the sides were snowy white, and the fins scarlet.

The other fish, the ecolar of the Canary islands, is common in warm latitudes, but has never before been taken so far north as in this case.

Both were taken at a depth of 1,000 feet.—Belfast Age.

Forty-eight tons of supplies were hauled from Berlin Falls, N. H., to Danforth's camp, a sportman's resort at Lake Parmachenee, Me., this season, at an expense of $1,000. The hunters who visit Parmachenee live high, and some of them have a sweet tooth, for 600 pounds of candy disappeared there last year.

There was quite a heavy fall of snow in Mobile Thursday, an event of great rarity and of equally great interest to the inhabitants. It was the first snow in five years and the fifth in seventy years.

He Wanted to Be Sure.

"I went down to Indiana not long ago," said a Michigan Central engineer to the reporter, "to see my folks, who live in a small town on a branch road that is about the worst I ever saw. At a way station a Hoosier came aboard, and a few minutes after he had curled up in the corner of a seat the conductor came along.

"'I say, conductor,' he inquired, 'is this train running now?'

"'Of course it is,' said the conductor, taking his ticket.

"Then he relapsed again, and in about fifteen minutes he beckoned to the conductor.

"'Is this train running now?' he asked as before.

"'Course it is. What's the matter with you?' said the conductor angrily.

"'Don't git mad about it,' urged the passenger mildly. 'I don't mean no insult. This yer train runs so slow that I can't tell when it's goin and when it ain't, and I've got to git off at the next station er the weddin that's set fer 6 o'clock won't take place, that's all. I hain't nothin ag'in you ner the road, but I'm jist a leetle mite anxious about landin in time fer the occasion, you understand.'

"The conductor apologized and the passenger was duly deposited at the appointed place."—Detroit Free Press.

The Church social at Lone Pine last week was a great success. Mrs. McCall's invitation was accepted by a large crowd and all thoroughly enjoyed themselves.

W. L. Coats finished shearing his spring clip of wool early in the week. He obtained close to 14,000 pounds of wool, which will be shipped to San Francisco.

Mr. and Mrs. T. W. Perry arrived at Independence on Thursday morning from Los Angeles. Mr. Perry is interested in Owens Valley and will spend a considerable time looking over the country.

Mr. and Mrs. F. Bedford arrived from Bishop last Monday. A reception was was given them at the residence of W. F. Matlack in the evening, and the young couple wished all sorts of happiness, in which we heartily join.

John D. Lewis started for Los Angeles via Mojave on Wednesday, where he will attend the meeting of the Grand Parlor of N. S. G. W. He expects to go from there to San Francisco and will probably be absent a considerable time.

J. F. Brooks C. E. was in town last evening. It is reported that surveying will be done soon to ascertain the feasibility of tapping the lakes west of town and erecting storage reservoirs for irrigating purposes. Nothing is yet definately known in regard to the intentions of Messrs. Mills & Austin in this respect.

World's Fair Display.

Mrs. A. W. Eibeshutz has been engaged for some time past in collecting an exhibit for the World's Fair. The feature of the display will be a large and complete assortment of Indian work. Also some curios. There are several parties in different parts of the county who are collecting for her. It is her intention to collect specimens of native flowers and grasses, and indeed every native product calculated to be of interest. The lady is earnest in her efforts and should meet with every encouragement. She is in communication with the managers of the California exhibit at San Francisco, and they have promised to aid her in every way.

A traveling man who chanced to be in the store of E. V. Wood, at McKees Rocks Pa., says while he was waiting to see Mr. Wood, a little girl came in with an empty bottle labeled Chamberlain's Pain Balm and said: "Mamma wants another bottle of that medicine; she says it is the best medicine for rheumatism she ever used." 50 cent bottles for sale by

Took The Prize.

I have been choosen on cap Hales side for the contest for this quarter but i haint had no chance much to wriet anything, and swamping on a borax train dont give a boy no show to git things together in the shape of an essay; more than that I haint got no experiance in making essays, yet I believe that all good templars ought to do all they can to help out the side they belong to: and if I dont come to the top notch of the essay monument, I hope you wont all make fun of me. I cant get time to write a long one this trip, and I shant name no particular subject as the name of my first essay. Alvord station is the western most corner of the road used by the borax trains: and big Pine of temperauce town is where the owners of the borax works live; which their names is Conn and Trudo; the east end of the road stays out to the borax works all the time, which is in saline valley. Theres different kinds of weather in places on this road and I was never in a place with more weather in it than saline valley has: in the bright days of summer. The weather there is mixed with knats, lizards, and chuckwallers a good deal. The knats is small but active and industrious. I might say they is extreemly busy and can do more hurtin for their size than bigger birds can. I haint got nothin agin the lizard much but from the way they live I dont think that they are very sociable nor neighbor like, you hardly ever see more than one in a drove. They is remarkable quick in their ways. I dont know which is their best holt, runnin or stoppin. They dress well and seem to live a very temperte life. I never seen one of them drunk. They wear their pants under their chins: If I had a race horse worth ten thousand dollars I would call him lizard and I would quit a swamping on a borax train just as soon as he quit winner. The chuck waller was laid out on the same plan as a lizard, but they got more timber into him; some folks thinks he is a connection of theirn. If he is I should think they would be down on him for his shiftlessness. To say nuthin about his being tired all the time, a chuckwaller dont never do nuthin ceptin lay around and enjoy hisself. They aint got no gratitude to speak of neither: the boys give one of them a ride to Big Pine last summer, and the boy what brung him in was a goin to give him a nice long ride on the cars, way back to misonry to see his gal's folkses, and he up and died; when this boys gal hered of it she wept: so you see a chuckwaller dont care for nobodys feelins. If you recollect how it was when you made your first essay you can catch on to how it is with me. I will close.

Indian Enterprise.

The Indians about Big Pine are entitled to great credit for the efforts they have made to secure an education for their children. Several months ago they raised a sufficient subscription among themselves to buy lumber enough for a good sized building. The whites assisted to raise the building and did the carpenter work; and now a nice little schoolhouse near the Big Pine District school stands as a monument of their efforts in the cause of education. Last year they subscribed enough money to hire a teacher and maintained a school for several months. It is quite likely that the enterprising natives will receive Government assistance, as an official visited Big Pine last week, and it is said that he will report favorably. It is to be hoped that the assistance will not amount to interference, as an Indian does best when left measurably to his own devices.

Mr. J. P. Blaize, an extensive real estate dealer in Des Moines, Iowa, narrowly escaped one of the severest attacks of pneumonia while in the northern part of that State during a recent blizzard, says the Saturday Review. Mr. Blaise had occasion to drive several miles during the storm and was so thoroughly chilled that he was unable to get warm, and inside of an hour after his return he was threatened with a severe case of pneumonia or lung fever. Mr. Blaize sent to the nearest drug store and got a bottle of Chamberlain's Cough Remedy, of which he had often heard, and took a number of large doses. He says the effect was wonderful and that in a short time he was breathing quite easily. He kept on taking the medicine and in a few days was able to come to Des Moines. Mr. Blaize regards his cure as simply wonderful. 50 cent bottles for sale by

SITS DOWN ON A BAKING POWDER CO,

ROYAL'S OLD GAME.

STATE BOARD OF HEALTH OF NEW YORK.

Albany, N. Y., April 28th, 1888.

To John Anderson, Esq

Chicago, Ill.

Dear Sir:-

In response to yours of April 20th, in regard to the advertising of the Royal Baking Powder Company I have the honor to send you the following resolution adopted by the Board at its quarterly meeting held in Albany Feb. 11th, 1888.

'Resolved, That the advertisement of the Royal Baking Powder Company, quoting the State Board of Health of New York as recommending, through one of its analysts, its purity, etc., is a misrepresentation. In no case does the State Board of Health or its representatives, cause such examination to be made with a view of recommending any particular products.

Very truly yours,

W. P. Carman
Asst Sec'y

The misrepresentation which called forth the resolution of the State Board of Health of New York, printed above, is in keeping with the old tactics of the Royal Baking Powder Company.

First it manufactured a Government Chemist out of whole cloth, and the garment was cut and made to fit Dr. Henry A. Mott, and later poor Dr. Love.

It did not hesitate to send broadcast, the statement that the New York Board of Health had endorsed and recommended the Royal (Ammonia) Baking Powder.

It did not take the New York Board of Health very long to assert itself on this misrepresentation as will be seen from the foregoing letter.

These questionable methods of advertising have never been resorted to by the Price Baking Powder Co. The old-fashioned honest way of making a pure Cream Tartar Baking Powder is much to be preferred. No ammonia to conceal, nothing to bolster up.

The success of Dr. Price proves honesty is the best business policy in food products, as in everything else.

Silence is the safest response for all the contradiction that arises from impertinence, vulgarity or envy.

BABY WISDOM.

My baby Nell at the window pane
Gazed solemnly out at the driving rain;
With grave reflection the blue eyes fraught—
My darling was wrapt in profoundest thought
"Sage old Wisdom has passed," I said,
"And touched his wand to that baby head.
The grim old fellow, now and then,
Passes us older women and men,
To trace a look, so wondrous wise,
In the fathomless depths of a baby's eyes.
Problems of moment and questions of fate
Are hidden away 'neath that curly pate."
Then I crossed to the little figure there,
And laid a hand on her sunny hair.
"What do you find, but cold and wet,
To chain your gaze to the window, pet?"
Her eyes were misty with unshed tears,
As slowly she turned round her golden head—
"Ize wonderin' what makes Dod cwy," she said
—J. Herbert Phillips in Belford's Magazine.

MY DEBUT AS A VILLAIN.

The company was billed to play my new tragedy, "The Dripping Dagger, or the Maiden Martyr of Tankville," at Willowtown, on Tuesday night, when suddenly our heavy villain absconded, taking with him $5.50, the entire amount in the treasury of the concern! What was to be done about it? It was too late to advertise for another heavy villain; and, besides, there were very few of them in the states at that time, because the small-pox was not raging in Montreal. We had a consultation, and decided that something must be done. I suggested that, as a last resort, the part of the villain might be left out, and the heroine might make away with herself at the proper time; but as there really did not seem to be any reason why she should commit suicide in the circumstances, we concluded that it might detract from the impressiveness and destroy the unity of the play, and that on the whole my suggestion was not just the thing. Finally the heroine asked me if I wouldn't play the part of the villain! I reminded her that my contract with the company expressly provided that I should be exempt from histrionic duties, and, furthermore, that I knew I had no talent whatever for acting, and might become embarrassed and forget my part, or do something else equally as unfortunate. But she persisted that I was just the man for a villain—cut out for the part, as it were, by nature; and, as for getting stuck in my lines, she said that she would guarantee to help me out of that difficulty herself, as she knew every word of the play by heart, and could easily prompt me in a tone that would not be heard by the audience. Well, the result was that the fair heroine—to whose charms I was not altogether blind—prevailed upon me, and against my better judgment I consented to take the part of the villain.

I devoted four days to committing the part to memory. I then rehearsed for the first time with the company, in costume, and succeeded in getting as far as the stabbing scene without losing my cue. Here I could not remember whether the victim shrieked first or I, in deep bass tones, exclaimed: "Aha! disdainful one, prepare to die!" The result was that we both gave utterance to our emotions at the same time, creating a very undramatic hubbub. The entire company broke down and laughed for several minutes. But we got through with the rest of the tragedy all right, and the second rehearsal went off better still. We had time for just one more rehersal before our appearance at Willowtown; but this rehearsal, strange to say, was not as good (as far as I was concerned) as the second.

On Tuesday we took the afternoon train for Willowtown. I was rather nervous all the way down, but the rest of the company cheered me up and assured me that the inspiration of appearing before an audience would take all my trepidation away. Thus encouraged, I made up my mind not to worry, but to do the best I could when the time came.

We arrived in Willowtown just in time for supper, and, after refreshing ourselves, we went immediately to the barn where the representation was to be given, and got our limited scenery and properties in shape. By 8 o'clock we were all on deck, in costume, and, when the stamping of feet and whistling among the audience warned us that it was time for the curtain to go up, we gave the signal to the shifter, and burst upon the assembled populace in all our splendor. I should state, however, that before our splendor became fully revealed, there was some levity among the audience, owing to the fact that the curtain rose at first only at one corner, revealing a large brown jug standing by a painted haycock—which, taken in connection with the harvest scene, of which it formed a part, was well enough, of course, but was rather incongruous, appearing, as it did, without the necessary scenic support.

The first scene passed off very smoothly, as neither of the principal characters, neither myself nor the heroine, appeared. In the second scene I was to come upon the stage in a sort of dark lantern fashion, wrapped in mystery and a long black cloak, introduce myself to the audience in a few half audible and occult remarks to one of the actresses and then disappear as abruptly as I had come, by a well executed and rapid backward movement, as though I had melted mysteriously into the gathering twilight. I had performed this feat very successfully at all the rehearsals, and thought I was ripe for it on the present occasion. In fact, it was the only thing in the role which I felt confident of performing to perfection.

As I came upon the stage, dark, saturnine, forbidding, with one corner of my cloak thrown over my left shoulder, a hush of awe fell upon the assembled audidience. My heart swelled with triumph, and I felt the inspiration of which my fellow actors had spoken thrilling to my very finger tips. The lady to whom I was to address my mysterious remarks started and cringed as I appeared suddenly before her. The sepulchral sentences were spoken. I raised my hand warningly and began to melt away in the twilight; but, alas! I had miscalculated the location of the opening through which I was to evaporate. There was a sudden crash that resounded through every part of the building, and the next instant I was flat on my back, wrestling with the foreground of the twilight scene, which had topped over upon me, while roars of laughter pealed from the delighted audience. To add to the ridiculousness of the performance, the scene shifter tried to let the curtain down with dispatch, but only the end opposite to me would descend, and in doing so very unexpectedly it left one of our farm laborers on the outside, near the footlights. This seemed to increase the amusement of the audience.

By the time the shifter got my end of the curtain down I was so exhausted with my struggles and my emotions that I had to be carried bodily into the dressing room. Brandy and other seductive restoratives were administered, and I finally came to sufficiently to wipe the perspiration from my brow and groan. Meanwhile the unfeeling audience was clamoring for the play to proceed. All the members of the company gathered around and besought me tearfully not to give up at this important juncture. They assured me that the accident was by no means an uncommon one; that the play need not be spoiled by it if all else went well; and they suggested that the audience would be more than willing to pardon an episode which had furnished so much innocent merriment not down on the bills. Finally, when the heroine, the lovely heroine, had cast herself at my feet and clasped her clammy hands in my own, pleading with irresistible eloquence of eye and lip, I consented to struggle through the remainder of the play and then and there close my histrionic career forever

Once more the curtain rose and the play went on. Like a man in a dream I came and went, mumbling my lines and going through my part in a wooden manner which fairly made the audience frantic. But hisses and groans moved me not; I was past caring for criticism either favorable or adverse. Only once did I partially wake up, when a small boy in the audience struck me on the side of the head with a hen pear of the vintage of 1814. At last came the stabbing scene in the lonely dell. I think I never prepared to kill a person with so much delirious pleasure as I prepared to put that heroine out of the way, and thus hasten the consummation of the play. The audience seemed to be slightly impressed once more as I came on in my sable cloak and soliloquized before the dreadful deed.

The fateful moment arrived. The heroine was seen approaching through the forest buried in the sweet thoughts of innocence and love. I hid behind the mossy trunk of a tree and awaited her coming. Suddenly my head whirled and my mind became a total blank! I could not for the life of me recall the tragic words with which I was to preface the bloody deed. The heroine approached, passed the tree, stopped for a moment in surprise, and then kept on. I did not step forward. I still crouched behind the tree. She passed me again, and as she did so gave a slight ahem to wake up her delinquent assassin. Then I sprang out and grasped her by the hair. I ought to have known better, but I was not in a condition to know anything or care for anything. The stage direction was: "The villian grasps the lady by the throat." To be grasped by the hair was evidently as far from the expectation of the heroine as anything could possibly be, for, with the most natural feminine gesture in the world, she threw back both her hands, uttered a little scream of horror and grasped at the departing wig! Too late! too late! There I stood with my should be gory hand filled with store hair, while my right hand, clutching the bright knife, hung sleeveless at my side. There was a moment's awful hush, and then the pathos of the scene burst upon the audience and the barn was filled with thunders of applause and demoniac yells. I did not wait for the curtain to fall; in fact, it did not fall, as the scene shifter was not in a condition to perform his accustomed functions. I rushed for the dressing room and hid myself under a pile of costumes.

Since that dreadful night I have never been inside a theatre, and the very sight of a barn makes me turn pale.—Drake's Magazine.

Miss St. Cyr was talking to old Lady Goldfoil about her heart affairs, and during the course of her conversation she said:

"Even your own son Harold, Mrs. Goldfoil, was a quondam lover of mine."

The old lady almost bounced out of her chair, but laughed it off, and, when she had gone to her room she spoke to her husband.

"Well," she said, indignantly, "there may be some excuse for fashionable young women talking about their various sweethearts, but profanity is utterly unpardonable."—Detroit Free Press.

NEW MEXICO.

A Wonderful Rich Country Directly Tributary to California.

San Francisco Chronicle, March 6th.

Mr. R. W. Tansill of Chicago, president of the R. W. Tansill Company, a gentleman who has achieved a national reputation as the proprietor and manufacturer of the celebrated Tansill's Punch brand of cigars, is in the city and is stopping at the Palace, where a reporter met him and obtained the following interview:

"Mr. Tansill, I learn that you are just from the Pecos valley, N. M., and that you are devoting a portion of your time to irrigation and to the development of that valley. Would you be kind enough to give our readers some ideas gained from your personal observation as to its possibilities and what is being accomplished there?"

"Why, my dear sir, were I to tell you of all that is now being done in the Pecos valley in the way of development it would require a special edition, something similar to the splendid edition of the Chronicle printed last June, I think it was, upon irrigation; but let me say here that Californians long ago recognized the bright future in store for the Pecos valley. They were in the field early, and I may say that they have profited greatly by their enterprise. For example, I would not dare to give the number of carloads of vines and trees that have been sold in Pecos valley during the past few months from California nurseries, for fear that you might think that I was exaggerating, but California is not supplying that country with vines and trees alone, but with merchandise of all kinds, while Californians are to be found all over the valley, and with which they are greatly delighted.

"How did you happen to go there?"

"Four years ago my health became impaired from overwork; my physician ordered a change of climate and advised me to go to a milder country. My friends called my attention to the development then about to commence in the Pecos valley. I decided to go there and investigate the country and its water supply for myself, and I was more than satisfied with what I found, for the soil, climate and water supply exceeded my most sanguine expectations."

"Where is the Pecos valley located, and which is the most direct route from California?"

"The Pecos valley lies in the southeastern portion of New Mexico, extending into Texas. The most direct route from San Francisco is over the Southern Pacific Railway to Mojave; thence over the Atlantic and Pacific and Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe to El Paso; thence over the Texas and Pacific Railway to Pecos City, Tex.; thence over the Pecos Valley Railway, ninety-three miles up the valley to Eddy, N. M., the county seat, and situated in about the center of the irrigated district, so that one can buy a ticket here or at any railroad station and go direct to Eddy by rail."

"How about the soil and climate?"

"This valley has a total length of about seven hundred miles, and from ten to forty miles in width, with an average elevation of about three thousand feet. The average rain fall is about thirteen inches per year. The atmosphere is light and dry, and delightfully pleasant and bracing, and statistics prove there is no better climate known for those afflicted with pulmonary or kindred diseases; it is truly a land of sunshine. The soil is as rich and as inexhaustible as that of the Nile. The climate is delightful, while the Pecos river, which runs through its entire length, is a great mountain stream supplemented and led by numerous immense springs or underground rivers, having a flow of about 1,000 cubic feet per second. The Pecos Irrigation and Improvement Company has, within the past two years, constructed in this valley one of the finest systems of reservoirs and irrigating canals in this country. Over 100 miles of main canals, besides as many more of laterals have already been constructed, and fully as many more are being built. The main canals are from twenty to forty-five feet in width on the bottom, and carry five to seven feet depth of water. About six miles above Eddy, at a cost of over $100,000, one of the largest and finest dams in the country has been constructed. It is built of limestone, is 300 feet wide at the base (which rests on solid bed rock), rises to the height of fifty feet and is nearly a quarter of a mile in length, forming a lake about seven miles in length, more than a mile and a half wide at its widest point and capable of storing over 5,000,000,000 gallons of water, or nearly a month's supply for the main canal were the river to go dry, which it has never been known to do. The system of canals extending from Roswell, N. M., on the north, and below the Texas and Pacific Railway in Texas south a distance of over 200 miles, either constructed or in course of construction, will irrigate about 400,000 acres of the choicest land under the sun. More than $2,000,000 have already been expended; and it is expected that $1,000,000 more will be expended during the coming year in extensions and new canals and reservoirs."

"Does the company own the lands?"

"It is not the object of this company to own or control lands. Less than four years ago they were all Government lands, but since which time they have almost all been entered under the homestead and desert land law, while desirable deeded lands, including a perpetual water right, subject to an annual rent of but $1.25 per acre, can still be purchased at from $15 to $30 per acre, making them the lowest priced irrigated lands on the continent. The extremely low prices now prevailing are caused by the fact that the time for proving up on thousands of acres filed on by speculators, who are unable to develope the land, has expired, or is about to expire; so that this is the opportunity for the farmer to secure land in this valley, suited to his means, at prices far below its actual value, since the crops that can be produced here will pay handsome interest on ten times the prices prevailing for lands at the present time. When this fact becomes better known the prices will certainly rapidly advance."

"What will these lands produce?"

"Almost everything that can be raised anywhere in the United States grows here luxuriantly except lemons and oranges; this is owing to the fact that the thermometer occasionally goes below the freezing point during the short winter. It is a most wonderful grape country, while all other fruits and vegetables do splendidly, all root crops produce enormously, such as beets, potatoes, etc., and cotton, hemp and tobacco can also be profitably grown. In fact, forty acres properly tilled in this valley will, I believe, produce better results than will 160 acres in the Northwest. Since the soil and climate and conditions are very similar to those of Southern California, and being 1,500 miles nearer the Eastern markets, this valley will rival that section in the production of semi-tropical fruits. Eddy, the county seat of Eddy county, is situated on the Pecos river, and is the present terminus of the Pecos Valley, a standard gauge steel track railroad, completed last year. It is the headquarters for both the irrigation and railroad companies, also of large cattle interests, and although barely two years old, it already contains a population of over a thousand people, is growing steadily, and is certain to become a city of importance in the near future. It already has a $65,000 hotel, one of the finest if not the finest in the Southwest, a national bank and many substantial business houses. Work is actively progressing on a $30,000 courthouse, while in connection with others a $30,000 business block is being constructed. Its residences are both neat and tasty, and are rapidly increasing in numbers. The town is beautifully situated, has a handsome park, and is laid out with shade trees on either side of the street, under which flow streams of clear water, producing a beautiful effect. Eddy is to-day one of the most active towns in the United States; labor of all kinds is in demand at good prices, and this is true of the whole valley."

The Pecos Irrigation and Improvement Co., at Eddy, New Mexico, have just issued an illustrated book containing a full description of the valley, and its resources, which they will mail free to any address upon application.

Long Lost Brothers Meet.

My mother was told the following story by a Mrs. Epps, who lived near our home in Virginia. It is not a fancy sketch to please the reader, but it is true in every detail. Mrs. Epps owned a plantation in North Carolina as well as in Virginia, and was in the habit of going from one to the other, using her family carriage as her conveyance, for that was before the day of railroads.

On one of these trips from North Carolina back to Virginia she had with her a large mastiff, a fierce dog, whose very looks inspired terror in strangers who came near him. During the journey she stopped for a night at a tavern where there happened to be another large mastiff very much like her own.

When the landlord saw her dog he asked her to permit him to tie the animal up, so as to keep him away from his; he feared that they would tear each other to pieces. But even while he was speaking his dog came toward the other one, and their manner of approaching each other seemed so strange to the landlord that he concluded to wait and see what they would do. He said he had never seen his dog approach another so quietly before. In fact, their actions were of the friendliest character, for they soon began to caress and play with each other in the most remarkable way.

Naturally Mrs. Epps and the tavern keeper began to ask questions, and it was developed that a gentleman in North Carolina had given them the puppies nearly two years before, and that the dogs were brothers.

Now, did these dogs remember each other, or was it instinct that told them they were brothers? I cannot decide the question.

But I have noticed among my brother's hounds that those nearly related to each other generally sleep together, and, while they often fight other dogs on the place, they do not fight among themselves.

There is an old saying that blood will tell, and perhaps it is true among dogs.—Atlanta Constitution.

Cheese as Food.

Much difference of opinion has prevailed in regard to the value of cheese as food, but we are beginning to get at real facts with a better understanding of the relations of the digestive functions of food elements. Cheese has been much lauded by many because of the great amount of nutritive food elements it contains, and people have been urged indiscriminately to eat it freely, some enthusiasts making the most extravagant claims for it as a health diet. But many people who have sought to follow this counsel find themselves speedily the victims of indigestion and dyspepsia. They would consider it little short of treason to charge their disordered digestion to the cheese, but the truth is the cheese is the most probable cause in any such case.

Although, so far as its constituents are concerned, cheese is fairly entitled to its fame as a model food, yet in raw cheese these constituents are very difficult of solution by the digestive juices—that is, raw cheese is indigestible to a degree that makes it unavailable as food except to the strongest and healthiest stomachs, and should not be eaten by any one who finds on trial that it gives his stomach the least discomfort. It is found, however, that cooking the cheese removes this difficulty and makes cheese easy of digestion, and as nutritious as tender meat or more so. Various methods have been adopted for this purpose, from plain broiling, frying or toasting to the most elaborate compound dishes. The main point is to get the cheese cooked so that the stomach can digest it.—Good Housekeeping.

The First Case of the Kind.

A group of legal friends of mine were discussing the probability of emotional insanity being the ultimate defense in a sensational murder trial—that need not be specifically mentioned—when one of the party recalled the fact that the defense of emotional insanity in murder cases was unheard of before 1868. That was the year of the celebrated McFarlane-Richardson tragedy in New York, and Graham, the attorney for McFarlane, attracted the attention of the members of the bar of both hemispheres when he plunged into the novel defense that McFarlane, while sane in every other particular, was insane upon the subject of Richardson, who he believed had foully wronged him, and that while he was perfectly sane until the moment he met his false friend, and sane the moment after he had killed him, that he was at the moment of the commission of the crime an irresponsible agent. McFarlane was acquitted after a trial that was followed with unabated interest for weeks by the entire country, and it completely revolutionized the system of defense in murder trials, and has been imitated in hundreds of instances since with a considerable percentage of success.—Lawyer in St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

ALLCOCK'S PLASTERS have enabled me to work and labor for the last two years. I have been troubled with a pain across my kidneys and a weakness of the spine which, at times, rendered me almost helpless. The first relief I obtained was by wearing two ALLCOCK'S PLASTERS, and I use about two every month, and I have no pain or difficulty. I consider them the best plasters in use. I, for one, cannot do without them.

You will do good less by what you say or do or even give, than by what you are.

BEWARE OF OINTMENTS FOR CATARRH THAT CONTAIN MERCURY,

As mercury will surely destroy the sense of smell and completely derange the whole system when entering it through the mucous surfaces. Such articles should never be used except on prescriptions from reputable physicians, as the damage they will do is ten fold to the good you can possibly derive from them. Hall's Catarrh Cure, manufactured by F. J. Cheney & Co., Toledo, O., contains no mercury, and is taken internally, and acts directly upon the blood and mucous surfaces of the system. In buying Hall's Catarrh Cure be sure you get the genuine. It is taken internally, and made in Toledo, Ohio, by F. J. Cheney & Co.

Sold by Druggists, price 75c. per bottle.

A little boy was asked by his Sunday School teacher why a certain part of the church was called the altar. "Because it is where people change their name," he promptly answered.

TAKEN FOR A CRANK

A semi-fiendish delight often seems to possess people of strong nerves in sneering at those with weak ones. The irritability of the nervous hypochondriac is ridiculed as natural ill temper. The very genuine and distressing symptoms from which he suffers are made light of. "He" or "she is a crank!" is the cheerful sort of sympathy with which the nervous invalid meets from the unfeeling and the thoughtless. At the same time no complaint is more defined and real, none has a more easily explainable origin when it is chronic. Imperfect digestion and assimilation are always accompanied by nervous debility and anxiety. Build up the powers of assimilation and digestion with Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, and nervous symptoms, sick headaches and a generally feeble condition of the system are remedied. Remember that fearful ravages are produced by la grippe among weakly, nervous people. Hostetter's Stomach Bitters cures it, and prevents malaria, rheumatism and kidney complaint.

Fortify yourself with contentment, for this is an impregnable fortress.

AIR CASTLES.

Fragile and weak are the castles of air
That form in a dreamer's brain;
The pearls of the ocean so rich and so rare,
The gems of the mine find a dwelling place there,
'Mid trophies from mountain and plain.

When meadows lay silent and still;
And up from the fields came the scent of the hay
As I tinkered and tinkered and tinkered away,
My castle walls grew till the moon shed its ray
O'er the brow of the sloping hill.

And I placed 'neath its portals a being so fair
That the birds, as they flew up above,
Stopped short in the midst of their flight through the air
To gaze on this being so fresh and so fair,
With the dews of the morning asleep in her hair,
And her eyes beaming over with love.

* * * * * * *

But now I am weary, I'll build me no more,
My castle has faded away;
My heart feels so weary, so sick and so sore,
As I think of the castles I builded of yore,
When joy lay behind me and joy lay before,
And life seemed so happy and gay.

For the being who dwelt in this castle of air
Lies under the sod—oh, so deep,
'Neath the buds and the blossoms, so fresh and so fair,
With the dews of the morning asleep in her hair,
And my heart sings a dirge to the theme of despair,
O'er the grave where she lies fast asleep.

—Philadelphia Ledger.

A DOUBLE SURPRISE.

For the first few weeks after we went into camp at Talo, away up in Upper Burmah, on the head waters of the Irawaddy river, we had a pretty stiff time of it, and what with fighting dacoits and locating sub-military stations about the country our hands were full. Then, just about the time things began to settle down, a new difficulty arose, for what little cultivated land there was had been robbed and plundered by the dacoits, and so the poor Burmese found themselves in danger of starving, and the worst of it was it looked as though we might have to starve with them. The Madras Pioneers, whom I commanded, were a brave and sturdy lot of fellows, but I saw only too plainly that their scant rations were having a serious effect. For awhile native traders had been coming down the Irawaddy in boats on their way to Mandalay, carrying gold leaf and indigo, sweet oil and pickled tea, and, what was of far more value to us, cocoanuts and bananas, eggs and rice; but the dacoits along the wooded banks of the river waylaid and robbed them so often that they were beginning to find it more profitable to stay at home, and a trader's boat was now a rare and curious thing.

"Well, Capt. Charlton," said a cheerful voice as I sat smoking a cheroot before my tent one evening, "pondering over the food problem, are you? Don't worry. I have found a sure solution for that."

The speaker was Lieut. Redvers, and he looked very happy and contented as he pulled out a camp stool and sat down at my side.

"I have a splendid idea," he went on. "Half a dozen of those cowardly traders were in camp this morning during your absence begging us to give them some protection. It seems the dacoits have robbed two boats in the past week. There is a whole nest of the wretches about ten miles above here. These traders circled round to avoid them, and they report a boat load of stuff lying at a village twenty miles up the river which they are afraid to bring down. Now my idea is this: Suppose we take a picked dozen of men and go back with these fellows. Then we hide ourselves in the boat, start down the river and when the dacoits come out to board us we pop up and give them a leaden reception. I assure you they will trouble no more traders' boats, and in future we will feast as royally as the Rajah of Munnipore himself. Now, what do you think of that, captain?"

The next morning I picked out half a dozen good men and, taking Redvers along, of course, we put ourselves under the guidance of the Burmese traders and started for the village, twenty miles distant.

That is, it was twenty miles by the water, but it was at least thirty by the way our guides led us, for we circled away back from the river, crossing over a couple of mountain ranges and wading through bamboo swamps and thorny jungles.

It was a perilous trip for such a handful of men and we were all glad when we arrived at the village about nightfall.

It was a mere trifle of a place, but it was encircled with a strong stockade of teak logs, and the natives had made such a heroic defense on the several occasions when it had been attacked by dacoits that the robbers had ceased to molest it. We found the boat moored along the bank. It was a typical Burmese barge, the very counterpart of a toy Noah's ark, with shelving roof and sides constructed of movable shutters that opened downward on hinges toward the water. It was propelled by a big stern paddle and the steersman occupied a little covered platform that was built up over the roof at the rear of the boat. We delayed our departure until after midnight so as to reach the decoy position about dawn.

The grateful natives plied us with food and drink, and just before we started an aged phoonge offered up prayers for our success in an old pagoda that stood on the bank. We stowed ourselves away in the interior of the boat, among the bananas and cocoanuts, and cutting loose from the bank we glided out on the sluggish stream.

It was very dark and very quiet. Redvers and I sat out on the deck with the boatmen, for it was necessary to keep a sharp lookout. The profile of the shore could be seen but dimly, and the steersman found it difficult to keep the center of the stream. It was a long and tedious ride, but at last the owner of the boar, whose name was Sang, pointed out a faint glimmer in the east and told us it was time to get ready. It grew gradually lighter, until from my knot hole in the shutter I could make out the trees on the shore quite plainly. We continued to float on very gently with the current, the suspense growing all the while more painful.

"Was it possible that our ruse was suspected?" I began to wonder.

Suddenly a shadow darkened the doorway and Sang whispered in softly: "We are near the place now, sahibs."

Every man took a final look at his rifle and made ready to cast loose the shutters when I should give the signal. We dropped down stream for a hundred yards or more in dead silence. I was falling into utter despair when suddenly a dark figure stepped out on the bank and hailed us loudly in Burmese, bidding our boatmen come peaceably to shore at once. Sang made reply. "We are poor boatmen from Myong," he cried, in well simulated tones of fear. "We are taking a cargo of rice to Tamo, and we pray that you will let us go by unharmed."

The only answer to this appeal was a derisive laugh and a sterner command to steer for the bank at once. Sang made no further reply, and as soon as the robber saw we were going to float on by regardless of his commands he gave a loud shout, and on the instant from the shadow of the bank three long pointed canoes shot out filled with savage looking fellows, who paddled directly for our boat.

"They are coming," I cried, excitedly. "Make ready now, men."

Redvers was down at the other end of the line with rifle in readiness, and I saw that every man had one trembling hand on the bolts of the shutter. The dacoits were so close now that I could see their faces plainly. They were armed with both guns and spears, and as they drew a little nearer they let fly a volley at our boatmen, which drove them inside, happily without injury. It was time to act, for the long canoes were close to the boat and I saw by the triumphant look of satisfaction on their swarthy faces that they anticipated an easy victory.

"Get ready," I answered. "Now, then, drop the shutters together, men, and let them have it."

The word of command had hardly left my lips when the shutters fell in unison, letting in a blinding glare of light, and so astounding the robbers that they actually ceased paddling for one second of stupefied amazement. Then our rifle fire raked through the canoes with deadly effect, and in an instant they had plunged overboard, some never to rise again, others striking out wildly for the shore, while the abandoned canoes floated off with the current.

One big savage, who seemed to be the leader, got confused and drove straight toward the boat. He came to the surface so close that I reached out and caught him by his long black hair and, with Redvers' assistance, hauled him struggling and kicking on board. By this time many of the dacoits had reached the shore, and their loud outcry showed plainly that it was their chief who had fallen into my hands. I was just about to order the men to give them another volley, when a loud cry from the steersman overhead attracted my attention, and looking down the river I saw a sight that nearly froze my blood. Less than a quarter of a mile distant a perfect fleet of canoes were moving out into the stream from both shores, and I saw that we were hopelessly cut off.

Two of our boatmen at once plunged overboard and gaining the right bank disappeared in the jungle. I confess I was badly scared. My first sensation was surprise at seeing such a large force of dacoits. Then I realized our peril. In this clumsy old craft we would be overwhelmed by sheer force of numbers, with no chance of escape. It was useless to attempt to reach the shore. The men with faces slightly blanched were waiting my orders.

A desperate struggle and a soldier's death were all that were left to us, and I was just about to tell them so when a glance at the sullen countenance of our captive inspired me with a brilliant idea.

I knew these dacoits were cowards at heart and, turning to the chief, I mustered up my scanty knowledge of Burmese and said fiercely: "You dog of a robber, if your men come a yard nearer I will shoot you on the spot," and I pulled out my revolver as I spoke.

"Listen," I said. "An Englishman never lies, and you know it. Bid your men go back to shore and let our boats go by unmolested. When we are five miles below here you shall be set free."

The robber shook his head sullenly, and I saw with alarm that we were fast drifting down into the horde of canoes. I sprang forward and seized him by the throat, pressing the cold muzzle of the revolver against his naked breast.

"Stop, stop, sahibs," he cried, falling on his knees. "I will do your bidding; only spare my life."

"Make haste," I cried, "or you die on the spot."

He advanced trembling to the front of the boat firmly held by Redvers and one of the men, and in a loud voice addressed his friends, motioning them backwards as he spoke.

My knowledge of Burmese was scant, but I could readily make out that he was assuring them that his life depended on their going to shore and letting the English sahibs go by unharmed.

It was a moment of dreadful suspense and for a time the issue was uncertain. Then to my unspeakable joy the dacoits with every evidence of baffled rage paddled sullenly to shore, some to the right bank, some to the left. Amid silence that was intense we drifted right down into that hornet's nest, Redvers clutching the dacoit chief, watching the dusky face for the least sign of treachery, the men nervous but alert with rifles actually at full cock, the remaining Burmese huddled together in the bow stupid with fright, and in the crow's nest overhead the steersman guiding the big paddle with hairbreadth accuracy.

It was a period of horrible uncertainty, and when at last the clumsy craft floated right between the double rows of canoes the suspense was almost unbearable. From both sides scores of dark savage faces watched us sharply, keenly, so close, indeed, that one could see plainly their greasy locks, the ornaments glittering on their half naked bodies and the weapons firmly clutched in their quivering hands. We seemed to move by inches, and I could scarce repress a shout of impatience. Every eye was fixed on the chief, but in the face of Redvers' revolver that dusky individual, who held all our lives in his hand, dared make no sign, and so we drifted on in solemn silence.

I knew how fervently the savages longed to let fly their deadly spears. Even the chief, doubting his own influence, was visibly disturbed, and I think he was as much relieved as any person present when the boat floated past the last bunch of canoes and the open river lay ahead of us. I wheeled round, rifle in hand, but not a dacoit stirred, and in this position I remained until a curve in the river hid the enemy from view.

We held on to our prisoner until we reached a point five miles below where the river narrowed and grew swifter. Here, true to my promise, I embarked him in shallow water, and, wading to shore, he plunged into the forest without a backward glance. We had little fear of pursuit now, for the country was more open and the current was strong, and before noon we safely arrived at Talo and anchored our precious boat load of provisions along the bank.

It turned out to have been a very fortunate expedition after all. The presence of such a force of dacoits in the neighborhood was a very timely discovery, and when they crept down on us after dark that same night they met with such a defeat as assured a quieter condition of affairs for some time to come.

From one of the prisoners who fell into our hands I learned to my chagrin and dismay that the dacoit chief whom I had held in such brief captivity was a notorious robber, on whose head more than one price had been set. I readily understood then how groundless had been our fears when we floated through the gantlet of the robbers, and I shuddered to think how close I had stood to that sanguinary monster. Still, even had his identity been known, honor would have compelled me to keep my promise and release him.

In a very short time Redvers' prediction came true, for, though small bodies of dacoits still lurked in the inaccessible spots along the river, they maintained a very frigid and distant demeanor towards the traders' boats, and before long we were living every whit as royally as his royal highness, the rajah of Munnipore.—Philadelphia Times.

THE NEW WONDERLAND.

A Cave of Vast Extent Just Coming into Notice.

AS YET IT IS BUT PARTIALLY EXPLORED.

Situated Near the Celebrated Mammoth Cave.—Beautiful Scenes.

Grand Avenue cave, in Edmonson county, Ky., is not more than six miles from Mammoth cave. The county is a honeycomb. There are very few surface springs and no running streams above ground except Green river, which sweeps through it on its way from the Blue mountains to the lowlands and the fertile valley of the Ohio. The foothills which stretch away toward the east mingle finally with the great Cumberland range. They are picturesque in outline and dotted with groves and forests. The valleys are fair and fertile, but one looks in vain for lakes or brooks. The rains descend, but the under world has swallowed up the streams—the caves contain them.

MAP OF GRAND AVENUE CAVE.

Grand Avenue is one of these caves which is almost unknown to the public. About thirteen miles of it are now accessible, and the work of exploration goes constantly on. One who has never been in a great cave lacks a most curious experience. You traverse an avenue and you come to an abyss. How deep it is you know not, for no lantern's ray can penetrate its depths. You follow a winding course to a crevice too small to admit your body. Beyond lies the unknown. It may be a vaulted cathedral—it may be a tortuous corkscrew ending in a dead wall. The pick, the crowbar, blasting powder, perhaps dynamite, must be used to force an entrance.

An instance of this improvement on nature can be seen in Joseph's Pit, which is a part of Lee avenue, about 200 feet below the level of the floor. A long but stout ladder leads down into it, and another some hundred yards farther leads out of it. On one side the wall is so thin that the gurgling of running water can be heard beyond. A slight opening leads toward this unseen stream and the aperture is being enlarged, so that before another summer the size and course of the supposed river will be determined.

ENTRANCE TO THE CAVE.

"Lover's Leap," near the end of the explored part of Briggs avenue, presents the height of sublimity. From a point above, though on a level with the floor of the avenue, the visitor looks down upon the great masses of rock through which the guide winds with the faint, glimmering spark of his lamp. Now he is lost to view, now he reappears. Again the darkness shuts about him, until at last he is seen far below like a gnome, with a firefly for attendant. At last, having come to the bottom of the chasm, he lights a torch and the jagged sides of the pit stand out in bold relief, their glistening crystals scintillating like stars against the gloom which their own shadows make. Far above a precipice projects from the wall. That is "Lover's Leap," a grim plateau, moveless as fate, inaccessible as perfect happiness on earth.

The "Hall of Statues" in Briggs avenue is one of the most delicately beautiful parts of the cave. The roof sparkles with gems which flash back the lantern's light. The floor is crusted with crystals white as snow. All around are weird shapes of stalactite and growing stalagmite. The "Tower of Babel" brings one back to his Sunday school days, for it is exactly like the old time picture of that structure which I used to see when a boy, except that the present tower reaches its completion, while the ancient one was a failure.

The cave has an unvarying temperature of from 49 to 51 degs., as registered by different thermometers. Several of these instruments are kept inside the cave, and none of them has ever been known to change the fraction of a degree. This perfect uniformity, together with the complete dryness, has given Grand Avenue all the requisites of an immense cold storage warehouse. These properties first brought the cave into notice. Some twenty-five years ago a mummy was found in one of its passages. Local tradition told of a family camping near by during the war of 1812 who were murdered by the Indians, except one young girl. She escaped and was never heard of again. It was concluded that she became lost and finally died of hunger in the cave. Therefore the mummy is thought to be her body. It was kept for some years in a small shanty inside the cave, which still stands, with its timbers looking fresh and new and the hinges to its door as bright as the day they were put on. The body was exhibited at Philadelphia in 1876, and is now in the Museum of Natural History, Central park, New York. I was shown the body of a raccoon that had wandered in and perished. Old men say it has been there more than fifty years, and it is now in a perfect state of preservation.

MOUNT CHIMBORAZO.

When any one thereabouts kill a cow or sheep he puts the carcass in the cave and uses from it at pleasure. It makes no difference whether the time it remains is one month or a year, the flesh continues fresh, sweet and juicy. It is the same way with fruit and vegetables. I saw Florida lemons and oranges which had been there since last winter, and they were even better than when first taken from the tree, as they seemed to be more juicy and of richer color.

The entrance is a most romantic spot. On the hillside, about 300 feet above the valley, stands a large farmhouse, which has accommodated the few strangers who have hitherto visited the place. On the long piazza the breeze from the opening—only about a hundred feet away—can be felt, cooling one on the hottest day in summer. The bushes below are forever stirred by the unceasing wind. Except for this everything is still and quaint and picturesque.

The descent is made by a stairway of about 200 steps, with landing places for those coming or going to stop and grow gradually accustomed to the upper or the lower air. At the bottom we are in Grand avenue, breathing air perfectly pure, dry and cool; though a hundred yards further water drips from the roof into a tank, and is run in troughs up to the entrance for use. This avenue has been explored nearly four miles. It is about seventy feet wide, with the ceiling from fifty to a hundred feet above, and the floor so smooth below that one can get an eight mile walk in this and Briggs avenue without meeting an obstruction. Evidently this has been the channel of a rushing stream, for the marks of water on the sides are plainly shown.

PILLARS OF HERCULES.

A few hundred yards from the entrance Briggs avenue turns away to the left and bends slightly toward the entrance. It has the same general characteristics as Grand avenue, but shows some wonderful formations—Statue hall and Mount Chimborazo being the most noticeable.

A little way farther on Lee avenue diverges to the right and leads the visitor through four miles of constantly changing scenery. Returning to Grand avenue and resuming the journey we soon come to Echo avenue, the most beautiful and wonderful part of the cave. On the sides are clusters of grapes, beds of ferns, swarms of bees hanging from the projecting rocks, and in one place upon the ceiling a perfect coral reef, as if one looked at it through the clear blue of tropic seas. Everywhere on the walls nature has made pictures. The Indian chief, the squaw, the owl, all are as perfect as if done by art. And in Fairy avenue, which is a continuation of Echo avenue, these displays become more beautiful than before. The stern of the Great Eastern, the prow of the Great Western, the bed of sponges, the pillars of Hercules, the organ loft with its white fringes dropping down over the two exquisite pillars on each side, and the elephant head with wicked eye and wrinkled trunk near by are superb. J. SOULE SMITH.

Mr. Wanamaker's Enterprise.

At a dinner party by a leading Philadelphian, an old gentleman with a good memory told this story. In the year 1857 two notable events occurred—the death and burial of Elisha K. Kane and the opening of a small clothing store by young John Wanamaker. During the month of May the great explorer died while away from home, and his remains were brought to Philadelphia for interment. An admiring public determined upon a magnificent and imposing funeral, and to this end many organizations and local societies were invited to participate. The head of the procession was to reach a certain square at 3 o'clock. An immense throng stood expectant at this hour, and eagerly waited the approach of the solemn cortege.

A few minutes before the hearse was expected there was heard a furious clattering of hoofs and wheels, and a gayly painted express wagon drawn by two beribboned horses dashed along the vacant line of march, and there fluttered from the wagon and sifted through the crowd a deluge of handbills. "Go to Wanamaker for cheap pants," "Gents' underwear at half price," "Cut rates in hosiery," were among the seductive invitations which were eagerly received by the crowd, and the young man who had so successfully evaded police regulations, driving his horses with one hand and distributing his advertisements with the other was none other than John Wanamaker himself.—New York Sun.

Abandoned but Saved.

A fox was fairly hallooed from a hiding place amid a ledge of rocks—high, secluded and inaccessible, yet withal conveniently enough situated for those nightly forays by which she had laid half the hen roosts in the district under repeated contribution. As the hounds were at hand the felon bounded away through the bushes, distancing her pursuers in the first instance and holding out the promise of a day's excellent sport. These exertions, however, were too violent to be long continued, and the hunters knew from the increased yelling of the pack that it was gaining upon the enemy every moment.

At this juncture a gentleman who rode foremost in the chase observed the animal pause, look around and then bound away, apparently with fresh vigor and greatly increased speed. Attracted by this circumstance he rode up to this spot, and there found a very young cub, which the affectionate mother had carried at least two miles in her teeth and which she did not abandon till the very last extremity. Situated as they were the party had no means of restoring the cub, but as a reward for the fidelity of the mother the whipper-in was immediately ordered to call off the dogs and recommence the sports of the day in a totally different quarter.—Exchange.

GUIPURE D'ART.

Needlework That Our Girls May Easily Learn.

A FEW INSTRUCTIONS TO THE BEGINNER

It is Generally Made of Linen Thread.—Pretty and Useful.

Guipure d'art is that species of needlework commonly known as antique lace. This lace can be purchased so cheaply that it would scarcely pay any girl to make it. But it would pay her to learn the stitches, as they are of use in other kinds of needlework.

Guipure d'art is generally made of linen thread, but silk or other material may be substituted. It is worked on a foundation of netting, usually called filet.

Netting is easily made. The necessary implements are a netting needle and a mesh stick. The mesh stick is of ivory, round or flat—flat is better for antique lace. The netting needle may be of steel for linen thread or silk, bone for wool. The needle is straight and forked at both ends. It should be wound lengthwise with thread, moderately full, like a shuttle.

To begin and net, pin a foundation loop fast to a cushion or table cover. What you want is a firm starting point. This may be dispensed with after the work is sufficiently advanced. Tie the end of the working thread, that wound on the needle fast to the foundation loop and take the mesh stick in the left hand, holding it between the thumb and forefinger. Take the needle in the right hand, pass the thread downward over the stick and the extended fingers; bring it up over the outside of the fingers, then forward between the thumb and forefinger, between which the loose loop thus made is held tightly for the present.

Now throw the thread down again over the outside of the hand, bring the needle towards you, pass it upward through the loop held over the fingers, under the mesh stick, through the foundation loop and in front of the thread proceeding from the thumb. Now gradually draw the needle through, so as to form a knot and a loop over the mesh stick. The stick regulates the size of the loop. Only practice can teach you just how to do this.

Make another loop just like the first in the foundation loop. Then draw out the stick; make another row in the same way, making one more loop in each row. Work in each loop of the preceding row, just as you did in the foundation loop. The work thus proceeds diagonally, but the meshes pull out square.

If desired netting can be started on a long string, instead of a foundation loop. Variety can be introduced by using sticks or threads of several sizes in alternation. In wool or silk several colors may be used and beads tacked on the knots or narrow ribbon run in. Netting is frequently used for shoulder capes, tidies, babies' caps, etc. To make the crown of a baby's cap do about thirty loops in a row, then run a thread through and draw up in a circle. Around this work as many rows of loops as may be desired. Netting is often edged off with ornamental crochet stitches. With stout twine, like macrame cord, any girl or boy might net a fishing net or a hammock.

Filet proper is coarse, square meshed netting of linen thread. To make guipure d'art the filet is first mounted on a frame. A suitable frame can be made by bending a wire into the shape of square or rectangle, joining the ends carefully and covering the wire smoothly with old silk or muslin sewed over the wire like tubing. Over this open parallelogram stretch out the filet, sewing or lacing the edges firmly to the covering.

The filet is to be filled in with lace stitches, some of which you already know. You know that point de Bruxelles, or Brussels point, is a loose buttonhole stitch, so loose that the stitches hang down in loops or picots.

Now, if you make two rows of this, crossing each other so that the loops are turned in opposite directions, you have made point d'esprit. If you examine a piece of antique lace you will see that its ground is largely covered with this stitch.

Another common stitch is plain in and out darning. But done evenly and carefully, it becomes an art stitch, known as point de toile. Point de feston is also a kind of darning, but it is done over the corner of a square, with a succession of loops over the foundation threads. Point de feston and point de Bruxelles can be grouped or combined in various ways, to form blocks, stars and other patterns.

Point de reprise is used chiefly in making leaves, petals, etc. Stretch two or three threads over one or more squares, then darn in and out over these threads. All of these stitches are exceedingly simple. With the present hints, all that you need in order to learn them is to examine a piece of antique lace. Wheels are sometimes introduced. These are the very same as used in point lace.

Lace-stitched done in silk are sometimes introduced into art embroidery. I have seen a pattern imitating antique lace, the squares of filet outlined upon a plush foundation and then worked over with point de feston.

The edge of antique lace is finished off with close buttonhole stitch. The scallops are cut out in square points, following, of course, the character of the meshes. Netting may be cut any length or width convenient, as it does not ravel out.—Margaret B. Harvey in Philadelphia Times.

Equals.

Every incident should be welcomed which, in a country where offended "honor" must be satisfied by questionable means, tends to make the practice of dueling absurd. Many a sensible man has escaped the lifelong remorse attendant on "bringing down his man" by the simple method of throwing cold water on the person's injured sensibilities in the beginning.

One day a distinguished notary, while breakfasting with a friend at a cafe in Paris, indulged in some stinging comments on the public acts of Marshal Marmont. Suddenly another gentleman, dining at a neighboring table, arose and approached them, his mustache bristling with anger.

"Sir," cried he, tragically, "you shall give me satisfaction!"

"Are you Marshal Marmont?" quietly asked the notary.

"I have not that honor," was the reply, "but I am his chief aid-de-camp."

"Give me your card, then, sir," said the notary. "I will send you my head clerk."—Youth's Companion.

Economy in Neckties.

Some small cobblers make a business of vamping patent leather shoes for $2. Nine hundred and ninety-five men out of a thousand throw away their patent leathers as soon as they crack. The same proportion of men discard light colored neckties when they become soiled. Various establishments clean them for fifteen cents each, or to practice more economy a can of ether for sixty cents will clean two dozen and a half of them.—New York Star.

A Remarkable Tree.

Growing near the baths of Alliaz, in the Canton of Vaud, Switzerland, almost within a stone's throw of the most popular hotel, 4,500 feet above the level of the sea, stands the most remarkable tree in the world. The trunk of the tree is ten meters, or a little over thirty feet, at the base. At about two yards above the ground it puts out on the south side seven offshoots. Bent and gnarled at the bottom, these side trunks soon straighten themselves up and rise perpendicular and parallel to the main stem. This feature is not perhaps wholly unparalleled, but another most curious fact is that the two largest of the side trunks are connected with the principal stem by sub-quadrangular braces resembling girders.

These beams have probably been formed by an anastomosing of branches, which although common enough among angosperms, has never been reported before in a conifer (the remarkable tree in question being a fir). The places where the side girders enter the main trunk of the tree are so smoothly barked over as to make it impossible to ascertain the manner in which nature formed the remarkable union.

The adaptation by which a limb, originally destined to grow free and bear foliage, has been converted into a living stick of timber is a strange one, affording a new illustration of the power of nature to fit itself to any and all circumstances.—St. Louis Republic.

Whistling for Seals.

In a letter to The American Naturalist E. F. Payne, of Toronto, records an interesting fact, which often came under his notice during a prolonged stay at Hudson's strait. "Here," he says, "the Esquimaux might often be seen lying at full length at the edge of an ice floe, and, although no seals could be seen, they persistently whistled in a low note similar to that often used in calling tame pigeons, or, if words can express my meaning, like a plaintive phe-ew, few-few, the first note being prolonged at least three seconds. If there were any seals within hearing distance they were invariably attracted to the spot, and it was amusing to see them lifting themselves as high as possible out of the water and slowly sinking their heads, as though highly delighted with the music.

"Here they would remain for some time, until one, perhaps more venturesome than the rest, would come within striking distance of the Esquimaux, who, starting to his feet with gun or harpoon, would often change the seal's tune of joy to one of sorrow, the others making off as rapidly as possible. The whistling had to be continuous, and was more effective if performed by another Esquimaux a short distance back from the one lying motionless at the edge of the ice. I may add that the experiment was often tried by myself with the same result."

The Dudes and the Fans.

It is not very long since that the students of classic Bonn, in summer time, threw away the walking stick and grasped the fan. In Italy and in France the fan was a favorite with the "curled darlings" at the theatre, in the concert room and on the promenades. The French writer Arnold relates how, one summer evening, while at the Opera house in Paris, he was incommoded by the flip-flapping of fans carried by two persons who sat near him. This nuisance, added to his short sight, interfered with his enjoyment of the opera.

Turning to the two delinquents, Arnold, in the politest of tones, said: "My dear ladies, if you will kindly moderate the use of your fans it will render me the happiest of men. He was surprised—and the impression then made on Arnold never left his mind—when, instead of hearing in reply the tones of a lady's voice, a deep bass smote his ear, and he found himself confronted with the black bearded, furious and reddened visages of two lieutenants of the guards. The amende quickly followed; the sons of Mars moderated the use of their fans, smothered their anger and Arnold was left in full enjoyment of the opera.—Exchange.

Fashionable Follies.

New York dinner givers who are straining after novelty have given some unique entertainments. One of these was a coaching dinner. The dinner table was in the form of a coach wheel, nearly fifteen feet in diameter, with spokes of ribbon and a brass hub which concealed an enormous electric light. The decorations were all of a fashion that suggested coaching, and the menu was constructed with a similar leaning toward that particular form of sport. Another dinner which was given by a prominent yachtsman taxed the inventive genius of a rival caterer. The steward gained access to his host's yacht in time to get lots of odds and ends from the pilot house and cabin in the way of telescopes, marine glasses, compasses, bells and so on, and they were all arranged with a due regard for the nautical character of the guests. Canvas ship chairs were used around the table, which was in the somewhat unusual form of a rudder, with a beautiful array of bottles in an imposing line on the tiller handle.—New York Letter.

Mail for a Grave.

There was received at the postoffice on the morning of one Memorial day a wreath of flowers that had come by mail some distance. The tag bore the requisite amount of postage stamps and the address, "To the grave of John Smith, Bowers, N. Y." It is a very unusual thing to receive a parcel addressed to a dead man or his grave, and the officials naturally were puzzled to know what to do with the wreath. They had no precedent to go by, so, after due deliberation, a postman was sent out with the wreath. Accompanied by a second official, who could affirm, if trouble arose, that the parcel had been tendered, he marched to the grave and waited awhile to see if a claimant for the wreath would come. No one appeared, of course, and as they were not authorized to leave it it was returned to the office. The wreath was presumably consigned to the dead parcel department.—Albany Argus.

The floor from Chertsey abbey was in fragments when discovered. It was removed by careful hands; with great labor and care the pieces were fitted together and placed in the Architectural museum at Westminster, where it remains. It is probably the finest and most beautiful piece of antique tile work extant.

HOW THE AVERAGE FRENCHMAN BATHES.

An American familiar with the fact that every house or apartment, renting as low as $300 per year in the United States, has its own bathtub, with hot and cold water supply and waste to remove the contents of the tub, is amused, if not amazed, when on a visit to Paris he gets an idea of the custom still prevailing in that metropolis of luxury and elegant buildings.

The large hotels, some very costly private mansions and apartments, and the public bathhouses have their bathrooms, as is the custom in the United States, though the French bathroom is really much larger, and is elegantly furnished with rugs, lounges, dressing tables, etc., the idea being that if one takes a bath one must lie down and take a nap after it.

People living in apartments costing as high as $1,000 a year, and in the new quarter of Paris in the neighborhood of the Champs Elysees, when they wish to bathe, other than take a sponge bath in a small portable tub, either go to the public bathing establishments or send to them to have a bath brought to their apartments. Sunday morning one sees a strange looking two wheeled cart like a very high dog cart, on which there is a framework built over the wheels. This framework can hold three bathtubs. They are made entirely of copper and are about 5 feet long, 20 inches deep at the end and 18 inches on the side.

The driver of this vehicle is perched up high on a small seat in front, is bareheaded and wears a blouse. On each side of him an iron ring encircles a copper colored vessel, holding about three gallons of hot water, which rests on a little shelf. He also carries a supply of dry towels and sheets. The bathing establishments have these carts, and when a patron sends word that he wants a hot bath at a certain hour the bath is put on the cart, the kettle filled with hot water, and the cart with its strange load is rapidly driven to the building in which the apartment is.

The driver carries the bathtub, as an Adirondack guide carries a canoe, on his head and shoulders, from the first to the fifth floor, as the case may be, and after spreading a sheet to protect the carpet, he spreads also a clean sheet inside of the tub, so that the bather does not touch the metal. Then he carries up the kettle of hot water which he has brought from the main establishment. The necessary cold water he gets on the premises, either on the same floor with the apartment, or in the courtyard.

When the bather has had his bath, the attendant removes the soiled water by dipping it out, wipes out the tub and carries it with his kettles and soiled towels down stairs to his cart. The charge for all this is about sixty cents, with the usual additional tip to the man.—Engineering Record.

Montana Sapphires.

The only locality in Montana which has been at all prolific of sapphires is the six or seven miles of placer ground between Ruby and Eldorado bars on the Missouri river, sixteen miles east of Helena. Here sapphires are found in glacial auriferous gravels while sluicing for gold, and until now have been considered only a by product. Up to the present time they have never been systematically mined. In 1889 one company took the option on 4,000 acres of the river banks, and several smaller companies have since been formed with a view of mining for these gems alone or in connection with gold.

The colors of the gems obtained, although beautiful and interesting, are not the standard blue or red shades generally demanded by the public. The stones embrace a great variety of the lighter shades of red, yellow, blue and green. The latter color is found quite pronounced, being rather a blue green than an emerald green. Nearly all the stones, when finely cut, have an apparent metallic luster which is strikingly peculiar to those from this locality. Neither red rubies nor true blue sapphires have yet been found.—Omaha Bee.

Curiosities in Eggs.

We met our old friend, Mr. Jesse Eaton, on the street the other day, and he told us of a wonderful egg his daughter came across a short time ago. On breaking it she discovered another perfectly formed egg with a shell inside of it. It was about the size of a partridge egg. Another gentleman standing by told of a curiosity in the shape of a double chicken that had been hatched on his place. The backs of the twins were united, and while one would be standing on his feet the feet of the other would be pointing upward. When growing tired of this position it or they would flop over and stand on the other feet, the positions being reversed. He said the chickens lived several days.—Farmington (Mo.) Times.

Where Coffee Comes From.

Coffee grows between the isothermal lines of 25 degs. north latitude and 30 degs. south latitude, and comes to us from all parts of the world within those lines—from Brazil, Java, Ceylon, Sumatra, India, Arabia, Abyssinia, the West Indies, Central America, Venezuela, Guiana, Peru and some of the Pacific islands. We get the most of it from Brazil, say an average of over 200,000,000 pounds a year for the last ten years.—New York Sun.

No Smile for Him.

He (ardently)—Sweet creature, why will you not smile upon my suit?

She (coldly)—My smile don't go with that suit. It's a ready made one, and couldn't have cost more than twelve dollars.—Pittsburg Bulletin.

INYO INDEPENDENT.

FRIDAY, APRIL 29 1892

The earthquake in Northern California last week was the most severe known in this State since 1812, or thereabouts, when the church at San Juan Capistrano was overthrown, killing a great many people who were worshiping in the building at the time. We have had a long immunity from earthquakes in this State, the last really serious one having occurred in the spring of 1872, the most notable manifestations being in Inyo county. We presume it is quite possible that some of the eastern visitors to California will be alarmed at this little seismic shake-up. It must be borne in mind, however, that nobody has been killed, and compared with the earthquake at Charleston, South Carolina, a few years ago, it is scarcely worthy of mention.

Certain events which stand in striking contrast to each other are taking place in this glorious country of ours at this present moment. By the act of Congress of March 3, 1891, 3,000,000 acres of the Cheyenne and Arapahoe Indian reservations in Oklahoma territory were restored to the public domain. These lands are thrown open to settlement, and there are enough home-seekers camped in the vicinity to take up every acre ten times over. Those who are anxious to secure homes are reported to be a fine class of people. While this state of affairs exists in the Northwest six score of industrious citizens living right at our doors, are to be evicted from their homesteads by a great corporation. The point to which we invite attention is that "Uncle Sam" is no longer rich enough to give us all a home. In fact, the time is near at hand when he will not have wherewith to give anyone a home.

The success of the Kelly—Crimmins faction of the Republican party in knocking out the Burns—Wilson combine at the primaries in San Francisco last week makes Democratic success in that city next fall a very easy thing. Colonel Dan Burns has the reputation of being a very good hater, and he has placed himself on record to the effect that if Kelly and Crimmins have anything to do with nominating the Republican ticket he will vote with the Democrats. He may not go to quite that extent, but it may be relied upon that he will have a knife in his boot. The next issue of the Wasp, the pictorial weekly recently purchased by Burns, will probably have something to say about the primaries that will make interesting reading. The cohesive power of public plunder, even, can scarcely avail to keep elements so discordant together.

During the past week the papers have contained a great deal of news about the troubles in Wyoming, but very little information as to the causes of the trouble or the the status of the contending factions. That a condition of armed conflict has existed and still exists has been obvious, but until recently the causes of the trouble have been extremely obscure. It now appears that the trouble has grown out of an attempt of the large cattle-owners, who are known in Wyoming as "range barons," to exclude the owners of small bands of cattle from the privilege of free range upon the public lands, which, it is plain to see, belong to neither of them, but to the United States. In order to secure a monopoly of the ranges for their own cattle the range barons formed a league or association, the avowed purpose of which was to drive the "rustlers," as the small owners are called, off the ranges and out of the country. To enlist public sympathy in their favor the range barons circulated general charges of cattle stealing against the rustlers, and assumed to be banded together to put an end to that which is a capital offense in a cattle raising country. It happened that the range barons found themselves outnumbered and outgeneraled. They went out for wool and came home shorn. Instead of surrounding the rustlers they found themselves hemmed in, and only the timely advent of a company of United States States cavalry prevented their annihilation. It is the old fight between the rich and the poor, and the strong and the week. Neither is wholly devoid of fault or wrong doing, in all probability, but the outlook is in favor of the so-called rustlers, who, it is evident have only done in a small way what the range barons have done on a larger scale, and to the successful accomplishment of which is due the foundation of their fortunes.

That there is a strong and distinct social caste in Creede, despite the practical democratic conduct of the masses in their business intercourse, was luminously exemplified by an event of no inconsiderable proportions at the Brainard & Bebee hotel on the evening of Feb. 22. It was the initial hop given by the fire company in commemoration of Washington's birthday. Tickets of admission were issued, and the closest vigilance was kept on those to whom tickets were given, lest some improper characters would gain admission to the dancing hall, which was the hotel dining room. There were present fifty-three ladies and about four times as many men. All the ladies were dressed in handsome ball costumes, and the decollete gown was there in force. The men—or a great many of them—wore the conventional swallow tail broadcloth.

The programme contained all the latest fashionable dances, round and square, and they were executed with an ease and grace that would do credit to St. Louis. A fine Italian orchestra furnished the music and the hotel people gave a spread that was a marvel of completeness. The cards were handsomely embossed, and premiums are being offered for them by people who were not there, to treasure them as souvenirs of the first ball in Creede.—Cor. St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Fought Under Custer.

For over thirty years a member of the family has been mourned as dead, but Wednesday he made a happy surprise to his old parents and friends with his presence. Ernest, the oldest son, a lad of sixteen, ran away from home in 1859, going to Minnesota, where he remained until 1862, when he enlisted in the civil war and remained until the close, when he joined the regular army under command of that gallant general, Custer. Nothing was ever heard of the young man until his name was by mistake placed in the list of killed in the great massacre at Little Big Horn.

The young man was severely injured in the fight, but recovered and lives to once more enter his home, where he will remain. Ernest well remembers the famous Indian fight, and relates the horrible spectacle he witnessed in a manner that chills a person's blood.—Cor. Indianapolis Sentinel.

Sunday Is the Proper Word.

At the town meeting in Sharon the much discussed question whether Sunday or Sabbath was the proper term to use was decided and the matter is no longer in doubt. A motion that the constables be authorized to enforce the laws against hunting and fishing on the Sabbath was made, and an amendment was made that the word Sunday should be substituted for Sabbath. This caused a heated discussion of nearly an hour, in which many took part. The amendment was carried by a small majority and the word Sabbath was changed to Sunday, and the motion as amended was carried.—Boston Journal.

Damages for Grief.

A new cause has arisen for a lawsuit. A woman in France was notified by the authorities of a lunatic asylum of her brother's death. She went to the funeral and ordered a handsome tombstone. Her mother was so grieved at her son's death that the plaintiff had to give up her situation to take care of her. Then she learned that the directors of the asylum had made a mistake, and that her brother was alive. After unsuccessful efforts for compensation she has gone to the court, claiming heavy damages for grief and injury.—New York Sun.

An Indignant Burglar.

On a recent morning about 3 o'clock a burglar visited Johnston's drug store, corner of Tenth and O streets, and instead of entering through the regularly provided doorway after ringing the night bell, he climbed over the transom and was about to help himself, when his noise aroused the clerk, who threw his boot at the intruder. "You've got a cheek to throw your boot at me," was the remark of the burglar, who said "Good night" and departed.—Washington Star.

A Big Job Ahead.

A bureau of press clippings in London has received the royal "command" to furnish twenty distinct sets of newspaper cuttings from every periodical in the world, so far as obtainable, referring to the death of Prince Albert Victor. The sets are to be pasted each in a separate album. The section directed to American clippings should make a very edifying collection, if the bureau is faithful in obeying the command.—New York Sun.

Onto the Bold Counterfeiter.

A letter addressed to Secretary Foster, and dated at Garret, Ind., has just been received, in which the writer states that "there is a man in this part of the country who is manufacturing counterfeit money;" that "he has a machine to print bills, from ones up to twenties, and they look perfect." The writer goes on to say that he will locate the man if it is to his interest.—Washington Cor. Indianapolis Journal.

The Mennonite German colony in Irving Lane county, Or., received an addition of twenty members in one family which arrived there a few weeks ago—mother and father, of middle age, and eighteen robust children. They came from Marion, S. D.

One of the horses belonging to the New York fire department got loose the other night and ascended the stairs to the second floor, and nearly frightened the driver into spasms by playfully poking his cold nose into the latter's face while asleep.

A citizen of Hume, Mo., traded horses with a friend, and was so delighted with his bargain that he led the animal into the house twice for his wife's inspection.

William Tulliver and Minnie Stackhouse were recently married on horseback in the rain at night at Paoli, Ind. The minister stood on the doorstep. The couple said they were rainsoaked and had too far to go to lose time.

One of the largest camelia plants ever known is now growing in a nursery near Birmingham, England. It quite fills a large greenhouse. Some 2,000 buds have been trimmed from the tree, and it still has 6,000.

Something.

A something hovers in the air,
And poises o'er the naked tree,
And rides upon the winged clouds,
Yet hath no form the eye can see:
But to the deeper, inward sight,
It is a presence sweet and true,
That fills the universe with joy,
And wakes the earth with impulse new!

A something in the forest word,
It scarcely may be named a voice,
Yet fettered captives hear its call,
And in their longing hearts rejoice—
A subtile whisper in the breeze,
So soft, it seems a spirit's breath,
Yet leafless bough grow tremulous
With ecstasy at what it saith!

A something rises with the morn,
And lingers with the sun's last ray,
Brings rapture to the silent night,
And faster to the shining day;
With yearning, half of bliss and pain,
It swells my heart, and, wondering,
I ask, What can it be? A bird
Sings at my window, "It is spring!"

The other day a Denver man stepped from the train, saw a lot he thought he would like, and asked the owner, who of course just "happened" to be standing near, what he would take for it.

"One thousand dollars," was the reply.

"Well, I'll see you again shortly. I want to look about and get my bearings."

After inquiring the prices of various other lots he concluded to take the first one. He had been gone but an hour, and felt a satisfaction at being able to do a little business so soon after his arrival, and remarked to a companion: "This is a hummer and no mistake." To the owner he said: "I've concluded to take your lot. Have the papers made out and we'll go up to the bank and get the money."

"The price has gone up since you were here. It is now $1,300," quietly remarked the owner.

"Three hundred dollars an hour!" he gasped, and was carried to the train. The pace was too killing. Such activity in realty and building has rarely been seen, even in Colorado. The buildings in Jimtown have arisen like mushrooms over night. An absence of a couple of days, and one would rub his eyes to be sure he was awake, so great is the change.—Cor. Denver Sun.

Waterproof Shoes.

Every winter sees a new idea in shoemaking to avoid wet and cold feet. The cork sole has outlived three or four inventions and seems very popular, but the fashionable idea is now to have oilskin lining between the uppers and the ordinary lining. This effectually keeps out the cold and wet, and by doing away with all ventilation and retaining the perspiration a considerable amount of warmth is acquired. The plan is probably open to certain sanitary objections, and residents in suburban districts far removed from granitoid or even plank walks, are willing to take a few chances in order to get down town with dry feet.

In Canada they have a simpler and much cheaper way of securing the same result by using a very thick sock made of wood pulp and millboard, which requires an immense amount of water to soak through. It is doubtful whether anything but good rubbers will pass muster from a medical standpoint, but so long as some people have a prejudice against wearing them, every winter will probably see some new invention to take their place.—Interview With a Shoe Dealer.

Spirit Rappings in Good Morse.

At a spiritual seance in a residence in the northern part of Millersburg one night, shortly after the circle was formed under the glare of the gaslight, peculiar rappings were heard on the table as if some telegraph operator were sending a message. The telegraph operator at the railroad office was sent for, and listening to the raps, declared they were made by an expert operator who seemed to know several persons present.

Several messages were sent and received, the telegraphic shade declaring he was not happy because he had not lived right on earth. The spirit then said he wanted to talk to Miss A——, whereupon that young lady in the circle promptly fainted and broke the combination, as nothing else was heard from the dissatisfied spirit. It is said the young lady in question had a dear friend, who was an expert operator, who died some years ago.—Correspondent Pittsburg Dispatch.

There is a great revival going on in our midst. Wednesday night the groceryman got up in meeting and said: "Brethren, I'm the man who furnished the orphan asylum with meat at twelve cents a pound when it wasn't worth six cents."

When he sat down another fellow jumped up and said: "Brethren, I want to make a clean breast of it. I'm the man who stole the meat that he furnished to the orphan aylum. Pray for us!"—Atlanta Constitution.

A Maine Man's Misfortune.

A wealthy Maine man who recently got married made over all his property to his wife as a mark of affection for her. Soon afterward she was suddenly taken ill, and, before she could make a will, she died. It is now said that all her property will go to her brother, and her husband will get nothing.—Exchange.

Discovery of a Turquoise Mine.

A turquoise mine has been discovered near the town of Ibrahim-Olga, about fifteen miles from Samarcand. This is said to be the third turquoise mine found in Central Asia.—New York Journal.

The Sanyasis of India.

Popular belief in India still credits Sanyasis and other holy vagabonds with miraculous powers. Even the native journals often chronicle marvels like the instantaneous cure of incurable diseases, or the feeding of thousands out of a small measure of rice. One of these prints gives a description of how a saintly Sanyasi saved the lives of a certain rajah and his escort from a wild elephant. As the party was proceeding through the Lower Himalayas a monstrous tusker broke out of the jungle and set to trumpeting. The rajah and his followers were considerably scared, and were giving themselves up for lost when a noble looking Sanyasis appeared, and, standing in front of the travelers, told them to shout a certain order to the elephant. This done, the animal bolted into the jungle, while the savior of the rajah and his party vanished without waiting to be thanked.—Philadelphia Ledger.

T. C. Boland was in town several days this week.

Politics are beginning to simmer. Be boiling pretty soon.

Mrs. R. C. Spear of Lone Pine visited Independence yesterday.

Arlie Mairs and Peter Laird went to Olancha on Wednesday,

The Democratic State Convention meets at Fresno on the 17th of May.

B. F. Gray and family of Keeler visited Independence during the week.

The trial of the Broder—Conklin case has been set for June 20th at Bridgeport.

Ed Walker came up from Olancha yesterday and will remain in town a day or two.

A. N. Bell accompanied by his daughter, Miss Annie Bell, left yesterday morning for Stockton to visit relatives.

On May 7th the Democratic County Central Committee meets and appoints Delegates to the State Convention.

The remains of the soldiers who were buried at Camp Independence were exhumed during the week and will be forwarded to San Francisco on to-morrow's train by express.

The Independence people who attended the Odd Fellows celebration at Bishop on Tuesday reported a thoroughly good time. They were cordially received and entertained and the arrangement of the affair was such as to ensure the pleasure of all.

Wm. G. Young, who has of late been teaching the children of B. F. Gray at Keeler, died in Independence on Monday last. He has been in very poor health for several years. Mr. Young was a native of England, 38 years of age, and we learn has seven brothers and two sisters in that country.—Index.

In this issue will be found the political announcement of John S. Gorman, the present incumbent, as candidate for Sheriff, subject to the action of the Republican County Convention. During the year and half in which Mr Gorman has been in office he has performed his duties carefully and conscientiously. He has proved a fearless and efficient officer, and as such is entitled to consideration at the hands of the people.

The Broder-Conklin Case.

BRIDGEPORT, April 22d.—In the case of Broder et als. vs. Conklin et al., the plaintiff moves the Court, that the hearing and final settlement of the final account of the Receiver, Edward Walker, filed April 23d, 1890, be set for May 14th at 10 o'clock a. m. motion granted. On motion of the plaintiff's attorney, the Court then orders that the sum of $2989, now in the hands of said Receiver, be deposited on or before the 14th day of May, 1892, with the Clerk of the Court, and by him to be deposited with the County Treasurer, subject to the further orders of the Court. Plaintiff's counsel then moves the Court for the appointment of a referee to take testimony of witnesses. Motion taken under advisement.

Mr. Pidge, the quarry superintendent, returned home from San Francisco after a two week's visit to his family a few days ago. He looks well. He is a good boss, and the boys were all glad to see him return.

They have been constructing a tramway from the quarry to the C. & C. R. R. during the last month, and it is just completed. It works very nicely. They can now handle very large stones without danger of breaking them.

The new channeling machine works like a charm and they will take out a great deal of marble in the near future. With their tramway and the C. & C. R. R. they can handle it very cheaply, so everybody can have a grave stone. Order in advance. A. Staudinger does work at the quarry. It is always good to be ready for anything, as we can't tell what will happen.

Last Saturday a young man by the name of Andy Johnson was struck by a flying piece of marble that broke his hand badly. Andy is now passing a few days in Lone Pine under Dr. Middleton.

Some of the boys had a lively time the other night. There was a big Missourian about six feet four came along without blankets and wanted to stay all night. So one of the boys, taking pity on the fellow lent him a quilt. Everything went all right till about twelve o'clock when "Bobby" —the Missourian— got the nightmare, and letting one of the most bloodcurdling yells out of him he went through the upper deck of bunks and after he had danced around there a while awhile one of the men got over his scare enough to ask, "Bobby, what the h—l is the matter with you?" when Bobby gently climbed down, rushed out doors and back again. Then he went to bed and very meekly drawled out, "What's the matter with you fellows?" The young fellow who let him have the blanket thought his day was done, or his night at any rate. He is a little tanned, but the other men in the room said he was as white as any man would wish to be. The boy says the next fellow can go without blankets so far as he is concerned. He has not got over his scare yet. The big Missourian wended his way up the railroad track the next morning, and the boy hopes he will return no more. So do some of the other fellows, I believe. The Chinese cook in the next room says' "I shake like anything."

The boys are going to build a pleasure boat on Owens Lake. The order is made out for the material and some of the money is paid in. It will be a big thing for pleasure seekers. Everybody will be most cordially invited to take a spin on the lake with them. It is to be made of sheet iron with iron ribs so the choppy waves will not bang it to pieces. They talk some of putting a small gasoline engine in it so they can go up the river.

It is bathing time now in the lake, and the boys will be clean for the next five or six months any way.

Obituary.

On wednesday evening about ten o'clock Mrs. Catherine Fehrman, wife of Mr. Henry Fehrman, died at Independence. It will be remembered that about three weeks ago she met with a severe accident from the effect of which she never recovered. The funeral takes place this afternoon at 2 o'clock at the Masonic and Odd Fellows' cemetery.

Mrs. Fehrman was a native of Schleswig-Holstein, Germany; aged 70 years and six months. She came to Inyo county with her husband in the early days and for many years lived on the Lacey ranch at Camp Independence. About five years ago Mr. and Mrs Fehrman went to Germany with the intention of remaining. But the lapse of so many years had made so many changes in the home of her childhood that she returned to Independence to end her days. She died childless but many warm friends mourn her taking away and sympathize with the bereaved husband.

Mr. J. P. Blaize, an extensive real estate dealer in Des Moines, Iowa, narrowly escaped one of the severest attacks of pneumonia while in the northern part of that State during a recent blizzard, says the Saturday Review. Mr. Blaise had occasion to drive several miles during the storm and was so thoroughly chilled that he was unable to get warm, and inside of an hour after his return he was threatened with a severe case of pneumonia or lung fever. Mr. Blaize sent to the nearest drug store and got a bottle of Chamberlain's Cough Remedy, of which he had often heard, and took a number of large doses. He says the effect was wonderful and that in a short time he was breathing quite easily. He kept on taking the medicine and in a few days was able to come to Des Moines. Mr. Blaize regards his cure as simply wonderful. 50 cent bottles for sale by Poison in the Kitchen.

No article entering so generally into the food of every household is so generally and villainously adultered as baking powder. These adulterated powders are shoved upon the public with the greatest persistency.

Throbbing advertisements in newspapers claiming this brand or that is absolutely pure, backed by analyses and certificates, and yet they are adulterated with ammonia or alum. It is to be hoped the law will take hold of these merciless manufacturers and punish them for destroying the stomachs of the unsuspecting consumer.

Amid all this fraud and deceit Dr. Price's Cream Baking Powder stands almost alone battling for pure food and continues to furnish a pure cream of tartar powder at almost the same cost to the people as the ammoina and alum powders are sold at, yet it costs much more to manufacture.

Dr. Price's Cream Baking Powder is of the highest strength. It produces the largest amount of leavening power attainable in a pure baking powder. It is free from ammonia or any other adulteration. No powder does such work. Housewives who have tested all use Dr. Prices only.

The size of your offering does not depend upon what you take out of your pocket, but what you leave in it.

THE OLD SEA WALL.

The wind blows north and the wind blows south.
The white gulls circle and poise afar
Where the breakers foam on the hidden bar;
The slant sails glisten, the bright beams fail

Clear in the plaza the three bells chime
At morn, at noon, and at vesper time;
The quaint fort lies in a dream of days
When the Spaniards wended the sandy ways
Where the fair haired children laugh and call

Progress leaps at the heels of change;
And a gayer life flows up and down
The narrow streets of the ancient town
Than ever they knew, those soldiers tall,
Who strode, long since, on the old sea wall.

Now, when the moonlight's mellow sheen
Silvers the roofs of St. Augustine,
The lovers linger side by side
On the path that looks on the gleaming tide;
And peace and joy hold the night in thrall,
For love is lord of the old sea wall.

MY FAIR CLIENT.

It was just such a day as this two years ago, and a year or so after my call to the bar, that my mysterious little visitor came; and now she seems to have vanished into thin air. I was sitting, as I am now, smoking a cigarette, and I believe I was wondering which of my lady friends would be most pleased to entertain me at 5 o'clock tea, and whether my clients would ever be numerous enough to prevent me from paying calls at all. There was a light in my clerk's eye as he showed her in, as if he did not regard her as a client at all. He saw the matter differently after I handed him his fee, and reminded him that the attorney general had laid down the rule that in non-contentious business there is nothing in the nature of professional etiquette to prevent a barrister from assisting his clients without the intervention of a solicitor.

She looked very much more cool and collected than I did, I am sure, as she walked up to my table and placed on it a little jingling envelope, saying with a half smile: "One pound three and sixpence—that's right, is it not?" I simply gasped, "What for?" forgetting all about the attorney general's edict, and thinking that a dear little female lunatic in the smartest of hats and frocks must have escaped from its asylum on purpose to visit me. I may add that she was unmistakably a lady. I have an eye for detail, and my first glance embraced her natty little patent leather boots, her gloves and general etceteras.

"What for?" she echoed, and then went on quickly: "Why, for your advice, of course. You are Mr. Fairbairn, are you not?" (I bowed.) "I hear that you are very clever" (I blushed), "and I want your help." (I smiled encouragingly.) "You need not try to find out who told me to come to you, for she won't tell you (the assistance of the fair sex in advertising one's capabilities is sometimes not to be despised); and you need not know my name, for it has nothing to do with it."

"With what?" I said, as she paused for breath.

"With my case."

"Will you explain your case to me?" I said, hoping that the explanation would be as long as possible.

"I've left all the papers behind," she said, "but they were of no use to Sir Humphrey Raby or Mr. Wigsby when they gave their opinion, so I thought they would be none to you. My solicitor took me to see them," she added, looking down and sighing as she recalled what no doubt was a painful and disappointing interview, "and they were snuffy, dull old gentlemen, and I've come to you because I was told you were very clever and original and had brilliant ideas." (I blushed again.) "I have their opinion, as they call it, in my pocket." As the names mentioned were those of two of the most eminent leaders practicing at the chancery bar, and as my client seemed to think that my original and brilliant intellect would instruct me in the facts of her case without her assistance or the usual sources of information, I held out my hand deprecatingly for the opinion, and read it through a couple of times before I wholly mastered its contents. It ran as follows:

Opinion: On the instructions before us we can not advise the residuary legatee that she has any grounds either for upsetting the will, on the ground of the lunacy of the testator, and so taking as next of kin, or that she can accept what the testator leaves her and refuse his conditions. He bequeaths to her the bulk of his fortune, which we understand to be considerable, on condition that she accepts it within a year of the date of his death, and that before accepting it she marries a husband. To this is appended the further condition that this husband shall be some other person than a certain Capt. Henry Scott-Sackleford, to whom the testator seems to have borne a particular dislike. Should she fail to accept the property on these conditions it is to be distributed among various charitable institutions named by the testator. It is suggested to us that will must be absolutely void, on the ground that this condition is in restraint of marriage and so contrary to public policy; we are aware of no authority which would support such a contention, and need hardly point out to the young lady that she is offered every inducement to marry at once, and that her choice of a husband ranges over the whole unmarried bachelor population of the world, to say nothing of the widowers and divorced husbands, with the one solitary exception named. At all events, it is our opinion that the residuary legatee must marry some one, not being the individual specified, before the 15th of May next, if she intends to accept the property.

Here followed the signatures of the two great luminaries, and I felt I must bow to their authority.

"I'm a common law man," I said, as I handed her back the document, "and they are very eminent chancery counsel."

"Oh," she said, "does that mean that you are cleverer than they?"

"Not precisely," I answered modestly.

"But chancery barristers are always prosy and inky," she said. "I have a cousin who is one, and he and all his friends are simply horrid. They may be very intellectual of course, but I call them stupid."

"Perhaps," I said, "on this side of the Strand we see more of the practical things of life."

She nodded with a hopeful smile, and I felt I ought to say something else.

"So you don't want to marry," I said.

"Don't want to!" she cried. "Why, it's just that; I do!"

"Then why don't you? Under the circumstances you would be justified in asking—in hinting at all events—if no one proposes to you."

"But they do," she said; "they propose in shoals, and have done so for months. Only the other day a girl said to me that she could not stay with the Blankneys for the Bicester ball, because a man would be in the house whom she had refused. 'Bless you,' I said to her, 'if I were to refuse invitations to all houses where I should meet men who had asked me to marry them I should stop at home for the rest of my life!'"

"Then you cannot fall in love?" I said.

"I am in love—that's just it."

"Won't he propose?"

"He proposed years ago."

"Then why don't you"—I felt myself getting puzzled, but she interrupted me.

"I don't see that you are so very clever," she said. "Can't you understand that my horrid old uncle has done his best to prevent me from ever marrying the only man I ever cared for in my whole life? How would you like some one to leave you money on condition you would not marry your Euphemia?" Her voice began to shake, and there were tears in her blue eyes.

"Are you a friend of Euphemia?" I said gently, to divert her thoughts for a moment. I really never blushed so often in an afternoon before or since.

"No," she answered, with a quick smile, though her voice shook as she continued, "I don't know her, but I know of her; and I hear that you love her very much, and when the solicitor said he could do no more to help me I came to you to see if you could; and oh, Mr. Fairbairn, I do want the money so to help my brothers and sisters as well as myself; and I can't, I can't give up Harry." Here she fairly broke down and sobbed aloud to my very great embarrassment.

"Well," I said, at my wit's end, after a few moments' silence, "you ought to marry—to marry—can't you marry—some one else first?"

"What!" she sobbed, "and wait for Harry till I'm an old, old woman?"

"Not exactly," said I; "your husband might—I mean you might div—I mean your marriage might be put an end to after a time, or he might die!"

She did not answer at once, and I felt I had been recommending a divorce by collusion, with the alternative suggestion of murder, and had perhaps said enough for the present.

"He might die," she said, meditatively, apparently rather struck with the latter suggestion.

"Of course he might" I said, cheerfully, "and his life might not be of much value."

"Then he would be sure to live unless he was very, very old to begin with."

"Do you know any one very, very old?" I asked, a new light dawning upon me.

"No one," she said, "except old Blifkins. He is 102."

"He's the very man!" I cried.

"Nonsense!" she answered. "He's a poor old man in our village and lives on brandy and snuff."

"Old Blifkins is the very man," I repeated. "Look here! If he's 102 he can not last much longer, and if you don't like to take him to church go to a registry office. He will be glad to end his days in affluence, and if you will send him to Jersey or some such place where liquor and snuff are cheap"——

"Oh, Mr. Fairbairn!" she exclaimed, "I couldn't."

"That settles it," I said rather dryly, rising and looking out of the window as I lit a fresh cigarette, "but of course if you could I understand your uncle's fortune is a very large one; there are your brothers and sisters to be thought of, and then there is what's his name, Tom, Bill, Harry"—as I said the last word the door clicked behind me, I heard a whisk of feminine draperies brushing the banisters and the stairs outside, while a silvery voice growing rapidly more distant called back something about "good-by," and about my being so clever, but I need not repeat that again.

I have not seen her or heard of her since. My friends could not or would not tell me anything. I was much mystified then, and now the fine spring afternoon has reminded me of her and I have recalled the whole history of the visit of my fair client.

* * * * * *

Five o'clock, by Jove! I must hurry home at once and take my wife for a stroll in the park. Euphemia never could stand being kept waiting. I wonder who that is knocking. A good brief, I hope. Probably some little paltry county court case. What do you say, William? A marriage settlement to draw. You know I never do any conveyancing; send it away. What solicitors? Sharpe & Wiseman; very good people, and new clients—about the biggest firm in London. What is the fee? Five hundred guineas! William! Five hundred guineas for drawing a marriage settlement! They must be mad. Who is it? Let me look. "Settlement on the marriage of Capt. Henry Scott Shackleford" (I've heard that name before somewhere) "and Constantia Blifkins, widow." Constantia Blifkins sounds rather high class! Steady, though, Blifkins! Blifkins? Where have I heard that name? Aha, I begin to understand. My little client, this is indeed gratitude. But if we ever meet again, Constantia, it will be for you to blush and for me to say with Talleyrand, "Oho, madame."—St. James' Budget.

Trying to Find Out.

One of the very literal little boys who doesn't live many miles from Bangor was left at home the other day in charge of a neighbor while his mother made a trip to Boston. Every day he would ask if his mother would be at home that day, and finally the girl, with a desire to say something to please him, told him that she thought his mother would come that night. "What makes you think so?" was the boy's next question, and when told that she "felt it in her bones" the little fellow thought it the queerest thing he had ever heard of. His mother didn't come, however, and the next day he went around feeling of his arms from the shoulder to the hand until some one asked him what he was doing, when he replied: "Trying to find out if mamma is coming home to night."—Bangor Whig.

The Girl Who Knows Everything.

Naturally it isn't you or your friend, but you certainly know her, and just as certainly you dislike her. When you dislike people there is one thing you should always do, and that is, look well at their faults and make up your mind that you are not going to fall into them. This girl, who is quite too general to be pleasant, is the girl who, having learned something yesterday, knows everything. She makes herself obnoxious by flaunting recently acquired knowledge, concluding always that the people who are quiet are ignorant; she has no hesitancy in contradicting anybody; she makes an entire luncheon disagreeable by giving her opinion on the last pronunciations, forgetting that custom makes many things correct, of which the dictionary has no mention.—Ladies' Home Journal.

BAKING POWDER in the New York Legislature.

The following, taken from "The Oil, Paint and Drug Reporter," refers to a new bill just introduced in the legislature of New York State:

"The latest development in the baking powder war, is the introduction of a bill in the Legislature of this State, requiring all packages of baking powder which contain ammonia, to be branded with a statement of that fact in large type on the label.

Now while the ammonia contention is on, why cannot the law give the public the benefit of the doubt? Wholly unprejudiced people are certainly not willing to be dosed with the substance acknowledged as a poison, simply because scientists, some of whom are not even physiologists, disagree as to its potency."

A similar bill was introduced last April but it is shrewdly surmised that the influence of interested parties prevented its passage. The provisions of the present bill are so just that it probably will soon become a law.

This will be welcome news to the manufacturers of pure Cream of Tartar baking powders, the most prominent of whom is the Price Baking Powder Co. of Chicago and St. Louis, makers of Dr. Price's Cream Baking Powder, who have always made a strictly pure Cream of Tartar powder, notwithstanding the temptations of adulteration suggested by the enormous profits realized by a large New York concern which uses ammonia, and advertises its powder as strictly pure, by means of garbled official reports and certificates signed by its own employees, dubbed professor, doctor or government chemist, as fancy may dictate.

A bill compelling alum powders to be conspicuously labeled as such, already exists in Minnesota and it is to be hoped in the interest of the consumer that similar laws will soon be enacted in other states, for ammonia as well as alum.

The following powders known to contain either ammonia or alum or both, will be affected by the proposed legislation:

Royal, Pearl, Calumet, Chicago Yeast, Forest City, One Spoon (Taylor's), Bon Bon, Kenton, Echo, Snow Puff, Uncrialled, Yarnall's One Spoon, Shephard's Economical, Crown, Climax, Hercules, Monarch, New Era, Snow Ball.

Bog Butter.

Numerous specimens of ancient butter are to be seen in the Irish museums, which were discovered during the past century by peasants engaged in digging peat. Some of them were dug from depths of ten, fifteen and even eighteen feet below the surface of the ground, and considerable antiquity must be allotted to the finds, although no absolute data exists by which the average increase of bog soil may be calculated. Examples of this butter weigh as much as thirty and forty pounds and upward, and are identified by the numerous hairs of reddish color as being the product of the cow.

The butter is found packed in hollowed vessels of wood and in masses of irregular form. The latter are usually surrounded with a layer of moss and at times have an additional covering of linen cloth. The object of thus burying butter in peat or immersing it in bog water would appear to be its preservation under circumstances and in districts where salt could not be procured.

Chemical examination still demonstrates the presence of those oily acids obtainable from ordinary butter and the absence of common salt. This is characteristic, for in the County Cork butter is still made without the subsequent addition of salt. The practice has long passed into oblivion and even the tradition is forgotten by the descendants of the race who must in former times have employed it as an ordinary and familiar proceeding.—Philadelphia Ledger.

Russia's Home for Foundlings.

The czar and general government of Russia shelters and provides well for at least one portion of its subjects, and the Russian army will never lack recruits so long as the present system of foundling homes is kept up, as each day many bring additions to this great army, who pass muster in these institutions, where they are tended with the most perfect care, not infrequently by the very mothers of the waifs themselves. These mothers, having no way of providing for their unfortunate children, bring them to the home, secure the number placed around the neck of the child and then apply for the nurse's position, thus securing the care of their own babies, while many bring them here and never see or hear of them again.

The government of Russia greatly encourages these institutions by providing for them in a most substantial and comfortable manner. We visited the home in Moscow, where we saw 1,000 of these little soldiers, none of them ten days old, two in each crib or in the nurse's arms, all out in the sunshine, and struggling for a life that had been so ruthlessly thrust upon them. They are brought into the institution at the rate of sixty per day. That number was in waiting in the anteroom to have their names and numbers entered in the book of fate for a home within its walls.—Denver News.

The Two Blarney Stones.

Five miles west of the city of Cork, where two streams meet, is the little valley of Blarney, with its castle, whose fame is world wide, for high on the northeastern side is set the famous "Blarney stone." It is said that he who is adventurous enough to reach it and has faith enough in it to kiss it will henceforth have a gift of marvelous efficacy. Honeyed words will flow from his lips and persuasive powers hang on his utterances. He will win his way everywhere and with everybody, and when mankind, and much more, womankind, are taken captive by the witchery of his tongue people will say, "He has kissed the Blarney stone."

There are two stones, however, each of which are claimed to be the real talisman, the other being on the summit of the castle. The stone last named is about two feet square and bears date of 1703. The one mentioned in the opening as being set in the wall on the northeastern side of the castle bears date of the building of the structure, which is 1446. To kiss this the votary must be let down from the top of the building some twenty feet by means of ropes. This has the effect of making most every one believe, or pretend to believe that the stone on the roof of the castle is the true "Blarney stone."—American Notes and Queries.

Would Blush to Find It Fame

Jones has a bad habit of snoring on the slightest provocation.

"Where is your papa?" asked a visitor one day of Jones' youthful son and heir.

"He's in his study asleep."

"How do you know that he's asleep, my little man?"

"I heard him, my papa sleeps out loud."—Judge.

Hearing and Telling.

The conversation had turned on gossiping servants.

"As for me," remarked Jones, who was present, "my dream is to have only two, one of whom should be deaf and the other dumb. The deaf rascal wouldn't be able to hear anything, and the dumb one couldn't repeat what he happened to hear."

Monstrous Bears.

Professor Russell, who has returned from Mount St. Elias, Alaska, tells a remarkable story of a meeting that he had with two bears. He was returning to camp over a rather steep slope of glacier, and found that the quickest and easiest way to make the journey was by sliding. Says he:

"Using my alpenstock as a brake, I descended swiftly and without difficulty for several hundred feet, my dogs bounding along beside me. Suddenly upon looking up I was startled to see two huge brown bears not more than 150 yards away. Had my slide been continued a few seconds more I should have been in exceedingly unpleasant company. I was unarmed and entirely unprepared for conflict with a pair of the most savage animals found in that country.

"They were not at all disturbed by my presence, and in spite of my shouts, which I thought would make them travel off, one of them came leisurely toward me. His strides over the snow revealed a strength and activity commanding admiration despite the decidedly uncomfortable feeling awakened by his proximity and evident curiosity.

"Later in the season I measured the tracks of an animal of the same species, made while walking over a soft, level surface, and found each impression to measure 9 by 17 inches and the stride to reach sixty-four inches. So far as I have been able to learn, this is the largest bear track that has been reported. Realizing my danger, I continued my snow slide, but in a different direction and with accelerated speed. The upper limit of the dense thicket clothing the slope of the mountain was soon reached, and my unwelcome companions were lost to sight."—Pittsburg Dispatch.

Ashes on Cigars.

"Few men professing to be judges of fine cigars know anything at all about smoking them," remarked a cigar dealer. "The ashes on the end of the cigar serve to retain the flavor, and should be permitted to remain as long as possible. Then the constant thumping some smokers give their cigars in the attempt to keep them clear of ashes often causes the wrappers to break, and that also lessens the pleasure of a good smoke."

He also added: "Never buy a ten cent cigar; let it be a five or fifteen, or even more, but a ten never. The ten cent cigars are made of the leavings of higher priced cigars and are never long filled, while the five cent cigars are manufactured from a first class second grade goods, are long fillers, and, as a rule, good smokers, unless the purchaser is unfortunate enough to have a 'two-for' put on him for a five cent cigar."—Exchange.

TAKEN FOR A CRANK

A semi-fiendish delight often seems to possess people of strong nerves in sneering at those with weak ones. The irritability of the nervous hypochondriac is ridiculed as natural ill temper. The very genuine and distressing symptoms from which he suffers are made light of. "He" or "she is a crank!" is the cheerful sort of sympathy with which the nervous invalid meets from the unfeeling and the thoughtless. At the same time no complaint is more defined and real, none has a more easily explainable origin when it is chronic. Imperfect digestion and assimilation are always accompanied by nervous debility and anxiety. Build up the powers of assimilation and digestion with Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, and nervous symptoms, sick headaches and a generally feeble condition of the system are remedied. Remember that fearful ravages are produced by la grippe among weakly, nervous people. Hostetter's Stomach Bitters cures it, and prevents malaria, rheumatism and kidney complaint.

BEWARE OF OINTMENTS FOR CATARRH THAT CONTAIN MERCURY,

As mercury will surely destroy the sense of smell and completely derange the whole system when entering it through the mucous surfaces. Such articles should never be used except on prescriptions from reputable physicians, as the damage they will do is ten fold to the good you can possibly derive from them. Hall's Catarrh Cure, manufactured by F. J. Cheney & Co., Toledo, O., contains no mercury, and is taken internally, and acts directly upon the blood and mucous surfaces of the system. In buying Hall's Catarrh Cure be sure you get the genuine. It is taken internally, and made in Toledo, Ohio, by F. J. Cheney & Co.

Sold by Druggists, price 75c. per bottle.

Let him cease to speak ill of others lest he should happen to hear of his own doing.

All over —your sufferings from Catarrh. That is, if you go about it in the right way.

There are plenty of wrong ways, that perhaps you've found out. They may relieve for a time, but they don't cure.

Worse yet, they may drive the disease to the lungs. You can't afford to experiment.

But there is a right way, and a sure way, that does cure. Thousands of otherwise hopeless cases have proved it. It's with Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy. By its mild, soothing, cleansing and healing properties, it permanently cures the worst chronic cases. Catarrhal Headache, "Cold in the Head"—everything catarrhal in its nature, is cured as if by magic.

It's a way so sure that the proprietors of Dr. Sage's Remedy offer, in good faith, $500 for a case of Catarrh which they cannot cure.

If it's sure enough for them to make the offer, it's sure enough for you to make the trial.

POLLY WANTS —I

—'Cracker?" I asked. But no—a bird's disdain
Answer'd my threadbare old refrain,
And Polly murmur'd—"Wants"—then paused,
Uncertain what her want was—caused
A feather from her cage to fall
(Plucked, in a pet, from wing)—'twas all.
"Polly wants" murmur'd she again,
In sort of ruminating strain,
Scratched her head and was still again,
Like some old grandsire, weak of brain,
Gone back to childhood's pleasing strain;
And sitting, drivelling all day long,
Repeats his wants in slow sing-song,
Wishing for—shadows—not a few,
Because he has naught else to do—
Or some wise fool (provoking mirth)
Who nothing less wants than—the earth!
Till, wrought to curious mood, I saw
'Twas wise, if possible, to draw
By coaxing (scolding made her worse)
From her her wish—she spurned at force.
"If Polly tells her wish," I said,
"With sugar plums she shall be fed!"—
"If Polly tells," I whispered low,
"She shall come forth from cage and go
To walk upon the garden wall!"
But Polly grunted, "Not at all;"
Then back relapsing, scratched her head,
And "Pretty Polly wants—" she said—
A pause—I stretched a coaxing hand,
And laid a sweetmeat on her stand.
She eyed it (on one side her head)—
"Polly wants two or three," she said.

* * * * * * *

In deep disgust from Polly's feast
I turned—for I had thought, at least,
Some higher wish I should have heard
Uttered by my superior bird—
When, lo! the oracle had named
Her wish—herself a vulgar epicure proclaim'd.
So goes the world. Deny who can—
And (it is due to Adam's fall)—
A grovelling creature, after all!

AMONG THE BREAKERS.

At a pleasant family reunion in New York the sons and daughters of an old commodore of the navy were assembled at the house of a well known citizen to celebrate a domestic anniversary.

The table had been cleared, cigars lighted, and the veteran, being urged by the young ladies to spin them a sea yarn, related the following story:

It occurred, he said, soon after I entered the service, now more than forty years ago. We were just about to leave Hampton Roads on a cruise, when the captain's gig dashed alongside, and with the old skipper came a slight, girlish, fair haired boy, apparently a mere child, but dressed in the uniform at that time worn by the midshipmen of our navy.

The little fellow had been sent to sea to learn an honorable profession, because his father, since his bankruptcy, could not educate his son at home in a manner becoming his former station. He stood uncertain for a while on the quarter deck, alone, neglected, abashed, until the captain, suddenly recollecting himself, turned round and introducing him to us ended by committing Harry Broughton, as I shall call him, to my oversight, as the oldest midshipman on board.

We were soon on intimate terms, and he was so frank, generous and winning in his manners that you could not, for the life of you, escape loving the little fellow. Even the rugged old tars would do anything to please him, and the severity of the first lieutenant himself often relaxed itself when little Harry, as we all called him, had offended against some paltry rule of discipline. Always the first to turn out in a gale, never to be found skulking like some of the other youngsters from his watch, and at all times eager to volunteer on any extra duty, he gradually wound himself into the hearts of every one on board, from the landlubbers in the waist to the captain in his after cabin. If we went on shore Harry was sure to be one of our company, for he was such a favorite with strangers on account of his youth and beauty that we were always better welcomed if he was along.

We had been out nearly three years, cruising on the Pacific station, when we were ordered home, and right glad we all were to hear the news. The long, beautiful moonlights came and went like the sound of music, and a hundred gallant fellows danced away the evening watches to the lively notes of the violin.

We reached the Philippine Islands, passed the straits and at last entered the Bay of Bengal. We were all heartily tired of close confinement on shipboard, and resolved to run up the bay and visit a few of the chief stations on the coast. It was a glorious day when we first caught sight of Madras, with the sunlight playing full on its walls and minarets, the long, low beach of white sand crowned with the walls of the fort above, and a tremendous surf rolling and thundering in ahead. Every heart beat high with pleasure, and it was not a difficult matter to obtain permission to land. A party of officers, among whom were Harry and myself, resolved to make an excursion into the town.

I should have mentioned that there is no port for vessels within twenty miles of St. George's fort, and as our frigate would be compelled to stretch out and in until our return we had but little time for our adventure. We had intended when we started to leave the boats outside the surf and to land in flats which are used for passing the breakers, and which, being sewed together and without keels, are admirably fitted to resist the jerking of the surf and cannot without great difficulty be overturned. But when we neared the shore we saw that none of these native boats were at hand, and as we had but little time to lose we lay upon our oars just outside the breakers and called a council to determine what to do.

"What say you, Frank, to making a dash, and passing it at once? It will be something to talk of—eh?"

I shook my head in disapprobation as I pointed to the huge billows that raced by us, and curling over a cable's length ahead broke with noise like thunder on the beach, while the shivered wave boiled and foamed in the vortex below.

"Give way, my sea dogs, give way!" shouted the third lieutenant, coming up abreast in gallant style; "shall we dash in, Mr. Tiller?"

"It looks like a venture where one cast is death, and the other a ducking, but what say you, Broughton?"

"Oh, sir," replied the little fellow, his eyes kindling as he spoke, "they say an English man-of-war's boat passed it a few years ago, and I'm sure we can do it, too. Besides, sir, we can try it with one boat first. It isn't such a high surf, after all, and look there, sir, they're watching us from the fort."

True enough, the officers of the garrison were quizzing us already with their glasses.

I still, however, objected, feeling a strange kind of presentiment that some dreadful accident would occur if we ventured in the surf. But the national pride of our men had been touched, and the lieutenant, seeing it, wavered no longer, and shouting the order to "Give way," our crew broke into a cheer and dashed rapidly up to the gigantic breakers.

The aspect of the surf as we approached it was terrible. Enormous billows rolled in, one after another rose like monsters, paused a moment with their white crests combing before they descended and then hurled their mass of water down into the abyss below with the noise of a mighty cataract.

Hitherto, all had been careless on board, and jests had been flying plentifully about, but every man now felt that a crisis was at hand, and accordingly the deepest silence prevailed, broken only by the noise of the oars and the quick orders of the lieutenant.

"Larboard!" shouted Tiller, waving his hand, "larboard a little more!" and riding on an enormous wave we were whirled into the heart of the surf, with two gigantic billows madly pursuing us on our quarter. For a moment we thought the crisis passed, but all at once the wave seemed to lose its impetus, and gliding from beneath us broached us almost broadside to, while the foremost of our pursuers dashed against us and heeled us nearly over into the abyss. We were losing all command of the boat, when suddenly a voice from our colleague outside of the surf exclaimed:

"Look out, there's a shark on your quarter!" At the same instant Tiller, perceiving our danger, thundered, "Larboard, hard—ease off there, larboard harder, for God's sake, down!" but the poor coxswain, startled by the ill timed warning from the other boat, and conscious of the terrible situation in which we were, lost for a moment all command of his faculties, and before he could regain them sufficiently to obey the command of his officer a wave struck us full on our broadside, and in another instant, with a wild cry of horror, we found ourselves struggling in the surf.

When I rose to the surface I struck out boldly, but I shall never forget the sight that met my eyes. The boat was already broken in pieces and the fragments tossing about, while the crew were struggling here and there in the breakers. A poor fellow was just ahead of me, buffeting with the waves, his agonized look fixed on a huge shark that lay eyeing him just without the surf. He screamed for succor, but it was in vain. The current was gradually sweeping him nearer to his terrible enemy. The other boat ventured as near as it could, but it would have been madness to approach nearer. Suddenly he gave a quick, shrill shriek, flung his arms upward and sank The next instant the blood red hue of the surface told the fearful cause.

As for myself, I struck desperately for the shore, and being a good swimmer as long as I could command my faculties I knew I had some chance of reaching land. I had turned in order to escape the current and find a place where the surf rolled in less frightfully, when I heard a faint cry, and saw little Harry struggling not two fathoms off. He seemed almost exhausted, and was barely able to keep his head above water.

"For the love of heaven," he cried, "Frank—here!" But as I swam towards him the noble boy exclaimed: "No! Save yourself—I'm nearly gone—am getting weak—tell mother and Fanny I died thinking of them."

"Courage!" I shouted; "I'll be there in a minute—hold on, my brave lad!" and I strained every nerve to reach him, but the current was so powerful that it baffled my efforts. One while the surf would sweep us far apart, and again dash us almost together. I saw, however, that I gradually neared the gallant little fellow.

The crew of the boat outside bent to their oars, determined at all risks to secure us, when suddenly there was a cry, "The shark! the shark!" And the huge monster shot along not twenty yards off between us and our only hope, the boat. My brain reeled as I looked. The boat was rapidly approaching, but the surf was too wild to suffer it to come near to where we were, and between us the frightful monster was sailing to and fro, waiting for the tide to sweep us out.

"I'm going, Frank; I can't stand it any longer. Oh, my poor mother and sister! God forgive me my sins," faintly said the boy.

"Hold on a minute, for heaven's sake!" I cried, for I was already within a yard or two of him.

"Hold on!" thundered the lieutenant from the boat; "we'll be there if we die for it—give way, lads, for a life, hurrah!"

But poor little Harry had held on until nature was completely worn out, and casting a wild look on all around he faintly ejaculated, "My mother, sister—oh, my God!" and then, with a convulsive jerk of his arms, sank like lead into the waters. The next moment I would have been by his side.

"For God's sake, come on quick!" I shouted as I dived.

But alas! my search was unsuccessful, and when I rose to the surface I was far away from the spot where Harry had disappeared and nearing with frightful rapidity the shark on the edge of the surf. The boat was yet too distant to promise any effective aid. I shall never forget the emotions of that instant. A sickening sensation came over me; my brain reeled, my joints grew weak and my arms seemed to refuse their duty. The monster was now nearly at my side. I could see his great fins appearing and disappearing, and almost feel the lashing of his huge tail as it beat against the waters. I gave up all my hopes of this world and all I loved, and shut my eyes upon my terrible enemy as I breathed a silent prayer for mercy to God. A moment that seemed years ensued—a moment of torture more horrible than any I ever had conceived—when a loud, sharp cry rang out just behind me, and at the same instant a coil of rope fell beside me as a voice called out in broken English, "Hold on!"

Clutching the cord mechanically, I felt myself drawn rapidly in among the breakers, while the enormous monster, perceiving he was going to be disappointed of his prey, struck the waves wildly with his tail, and dashed like lightning after me.

"In with him, hand over hand!" shouted a voice, and I felt myself jerked into one of the boats common on the coast. At the same instant a thundering cheer rung from the crew outside the surf. Forgetful of everything but my wonderful preservation I fell on my knees and thanked God I was alive.

When I looked again, I saw we were riding in upon the surf and the shark had sheered out to sea. We were soon landed, and I then learned the manner of my deliverance. Having been seen, a boat had put off to our rescue, and had already taken up several of our crew, when they discovered me struggling against the current. Had I not been engaged in endeavoring to save poor Harry I would have noticed their approach sooner. As it was, four of our crew were lost.

The poor boy, thank God, was washed ashore that same afternoon, and there was not a dry eye on the ship when they heard of his untimely end. We buried him near Madras, and so ended our battle with the surf.—True Flag.

MONEY IN BATHROOMS.

Modern Taste Tending Toward Pompeiian Style.

TUBS OF SILVER, BRASS AND COPPER.

Large and Convenient Bathrooms Considered Necessities.

Time has been within this generation when the bathroom was the least considered room in the house, if, indeed, such a room were not believed to be entirely superfluous. Time has been also, though in a somewhat distant past, when the bathroom was the most sumptuous and elegant apartment in the house. The old Pompeiians and fellows of that time and those tastes used to make bathrooms and bath houses and bathing establishments that, uncovered today, still reveal the marvelous beauty and luxury of their original appointments. Just at present the matter of bathrooms occupies a medium position, with a tendency toward the Pompeiian. The bathroom has not yet become the chief or the finest room in any of the beautiful modern houses that architects are designing and millionaires are building in and around this city, but very much money and a deal of artistic skill and scientific wisdom is being lavished upon those apartments in all modern houses, even in those that are built for renting.

A WELL FURNISHED BATHROOM.

In the first place, bathrooms are now built from twice to four times as large as they used to be. Formerly any little closet room would do for the bath tub. It wasn't even considered necessary to have it large enough to take a tub that would hold a person at full length. Its finishing was plain and its furnishing next to nothing. Now the bathroom must be a room anywhere from six by ten for a small and narrow house to twelve or fifteen feet square for a fine house, and even larger for many of the mansions now being erected.

The walls are of tiling usually, though hard wood and plaster are sometimes used, and the floors are of tile or marble. Stained glass is used in windows wherever possible, and in many cases the ceiling is arranged to open clear to the roof, and there is an ornamental glass roof.

The fittings of a well furnished bathroom now include, besides the regular tub, a sitz bath tub, with spray and wave bath attachments, and basins, closets and other apparatus to suit the taste or convenience of the owner and the amount of room at command. Copper is the cheapest material that is thought of for a fine bath tub, and frequently hundreds of dollars are expended upon the fabrication of a tub especially to suit the taste of a man or woman with unusually luxurious ideas. Mrs. Langtry, for instance, has a tub of silver. It was made originally for an Indian rajah, and came into Mrs Langtry's hands after passing through those of numerous people who couldn't imagine that such a magnificent thing could actually be used. It is in this that Mrs. Langtry takes the famous daily cold water baths over reading about which all other women shiver sympathetically and say "Oh, my!"

Plain copper tubs are often covered with enamel inside, and this may be made of various colors, such as may best suit the complexion of the persons using them. The use of taste in such a matter as this is more frequent among the women of today than would be suspected, dealers in bathroom apparatus say. The fact should go far toward settling the question as to whether women like to be beautiful for themselves alone or for others.

A great many bath tubs nowadays are made to stand on little short legs instead of being cased in clear to the floor. Raising them up in this way gives a chance for the air to circulate all around them, and leaves no opportunity for leaks or water splashed over the sides to keep the floor or woodwork damp and unhealthy. Such tubs are made of brass, bronze and other metals, and are lavishly decorated.

THE COST VARIES.

A woman wrote recently to an English paper protesting against the custom of setting bath tubs up above the floor instead of sinking them into it with the top of the tub on a level with the floor. She said the present style of tub was difficult and dangerous to get into and out of. The communication made some comment among architects and others in the business, but the woman's ideas failed to find any expert defenders. The general opinion was that a tub with the top even with the floor would be a deal more dangerous, if not more difficult to enter or leave, at least so long as tubs were made of their present dimensions and were not swimming tanks like those of the ancients.

In the matter of health there has within a few years been a great improvement in the construction of bath tubs and other apparatus for the bathroom. This has, however, been merely a keeping pace with the improvement in the sanitary conditions of the plumbing and similar work all over the house.

The cost of a really fine bathroom varies from a couple of hundred dollars, or even less where the walls and floors need no fixing, to as many thousands as one chooses to pay. The merely useful with incidental ornamental features cannot well go beyond $500, but when art steps in the limit to the game is wiped out, and one can play as high as his pocketbook will go. Many of the most beautiful works of art, both in fresco and oil paintings, in this city are in bathrooms, and costly statuary in bronze and marble is frequently added to the attractions of the place. Of course, art in such places runs much to the nude and semi-nude.

The business of furnishing bathrooms has become so important of late years that some firms devote their whole attention to it and have large capital invested in it. They issue regular catalogues of their apparatus, and furnish customers with illustrated suggestions as to the different styles in which a bathroom may be finished off. When the customer makes a selection from the suggestions or gets an architect to get him up original designs for the purpose, the firm takes the job of carrying out the plans, and, besides furnishing the apparatus and materials, has expert workmen to set them up and do the decorating and finishing of the room.

One final word to persons about to invest in a modern bathroom: Don't fail to save enough money to buy a handsome rug for it. Water won't hurt a fine rug, and it can easily be dried out in a few minutes if it is splashed, while for decorative and comforting effect in a bathroom there is nothing like it. A fine rug is as good as five degrees more heat in a bathroom, just from the warm, rich and comfortable look it gives the place.—New York Sun.

Foolish Act of a Young Lover.

In the spring of 1889 a young Irishman named Herman Fitzgerald, who had arrived in America a few months before, made his way into Perry county, Pa., and obtained employment with a farmer. He was industrious and got along well. As the autumn came on the young man fell in love with the sister of his employer. Their mutual attachment was observed by Fitzgerald's friends, and they guyed him unmercifully about his love affair. Patience ceased to be a virtue, and he became involved in a quarrel with two of his tormentors, who thrashed him. He felt the disgrace of his defeat and left the place, hoping to forget all about his troubles.

He stopped at a farmhouse in Juniata county, twenty miles away, and remained there over night, giving the name of Nicholas Paret. He heard the farmers talking about the burning of two barns a short time before, and immediately concocted the story that he was the incendiary. On the following day he went before a justice and confessed the crime. He was placed in the county jail, and in December was convicted. When the court sentenced him to ten years and six months in the western penitentiary Fitzgerald realized his serious position, and on the way back to the jail he admitted to the sheriff that he had not told the truth; that he knew nothing whatever of the crime, and that his motive in telling the story was that he wanted to go to jail about six months in order to escape his persecutors in Perry county.

This story reached the ears of the young fellow's friends, and steps were immediately taken to procure his release. As his first "confession" had been doubted on the trial, not only by the court but by the district attorney and the jury, they all united in a plea to the board of pardons in his behalf. The application was argued before the board and the case was held under advisement, the probabilities being that he would be pardoned at the next sitting. In the interval a telegram reached the board that the unfortunate young man had died in the penitentiary of typhoid fever.—Chicago Times.

A Kind Conductor in Europe.

Perhaps the funniest bit of genuine kindness was performed by a little Bolognese conductor, black eyed, with something of the figure of a Bologna sausage. The express train had been rushing through tunnels all day. Anxious to miss nothing, the girl had her head out of the window, until finally overcome by fatigue she fell asleep, with her head resting on the open window. A rapid stop in an immense station suddenly woke her. Looking at her watch, she saw it must be lunch time. She started out into the station toward the buffet; the conductor followed her, wildly gesticulating and talking in shrill Italian. She offered her ticket; he shook his head, getting more excited. He tried French: no use; still he followed her.

What could it be? The little man grew crimson with excitement and she more puzzled than ever. Finally a brilliant thought struck him; he put his hand in his pocket and pulled out—not a plum, but a big pocket mirror, and held it before her face. It told the story! The whole of one side of her face was as black as the ace of spades! The kindness of the little Italian, by which he almost lost his dinner, had saved her a mortifying debut at the dinner table before her fellow travelers.—Epoch.

Some Curious Changes in Names.

Rotten Row, as every Londoner knows, is a corruption of Route du Rol. The Bag o' Nails, a well known inn in that same city, was in classic day the Bacchanals. In the West Indies there have been some strange alterations in names. The Bog Walk in Jamaica, one of the prettiest river chasms in the world, was called by the Spaniards Bocca d'Agua. The present Wag Water, in the same island, a stream that fertilizes some of the best sugar and tobacco grounds in the world, was known to the Spaniards as the Agua Alta.

Turneffe, a large island and swampy paradise of the mosquito, lying off the coast of British Honduras, is a corruption of Terra Nuova, while Belize, the capital of the colony, is derived from Ballice, a small settlement first founded by the celebrated buccaneer Wallace, who subsequently became governor of Jamaica. Montreal, in Canada, is a corruption of Mount Royal. In Africa the most common name for rivers is "Don't know." The explorer asked some native the name, and in the dialect of his tribe the man at last said: "Don't know." The wanderer, eager for information, put the answer down as the name of the river, and Keith Johnstone lithographed it on his maps.—New York Tribune.

About Thackeray's Famous Broken Nose.

Sir William Fraser writes: "I have always believed that Thackeray's nose was broken in a fight at Charterhouse by Venables, Q. C., lately deceased. Unless I am mistaken this was told me by the person who introduced me to Thackeray. On at least one occasion I alluded to the fact, and Venables certainly did not deny it. My informant added that the 'Dame,' as we called them at Eton, ran up and said to Venables: 'You have spoilt the best looking boy in the school!'" A perhaps more veracious anecdote is contributed by "F. J. P.," who writes from Boston, U. S. A.: "When Thackeray was in America he dined one day with Mr. X., a distinguished literary man of this city, whose nose made a good second to Thackeray's. The ladies had left the room and the two gentlemen were sitting over their wine, when X. proposed that they should join the ladies; upon which Thackeray asked: 'What do the ladies care for two broken nosed old fellows like us?'" It is said that X. had no regard for Thackeray thereafter.—St. James' Gazette.

What Betrayed Him.

They were trying hard not to look like a bride and groom, but an incident happened that gave them clean away. They stepped out of the Ebbitt House for a walk. The young man looked at the threatening sky and then, with the solicitude peculiar to young husbands, concluded that he had better raise his umbrella, and then his beloved would be protected when the rain did come. So he unfastened the band of his natty umbrella, gave it a little flirt and then raised it. About a pint of rice showered down on his head and scattered over the pavement. The spectators roared, the bride giggled nervously and the young man beat a hasty retreat into the hotel to get the rice out of his hair.—Washington Star.

The people of the United States during 1889 smoked 3,955,955,773,722 cigars, which at 5 cents each cost the consumers $167,788,686.10. This sum at $20,000 a mile would have built 8,686 miles of railroad, and at $8,000 each would have purchased 20,973 locomotives.

"There goes Dr. Brown, the man that saved my life." "Did he have care of you then?" "No; but when I sent to him in my illness he advised me to send for another physician."—Exchange.

A DESPERATE STRUGGLE.

TERRIBLE CHARGES OF THE MAD BRUTE.

Rescue at Last.—A Magnificent Exhibition of Horsemanship.

Mr. Charles Davison, a well known stockman of this vicinity, reports a singular and well nigh fatal adventure which befell him in the valley of the Franklin mountains, lying north of this place. Your correspondent calling on him learned the following particulars which he gives in Mr. Davison's own words:

I had ridden out to a ranch owned by a man named Blake, about twenty miles from my place, for the purpose of looking at a lot of imported sheep he had for sale, and was returning when I met a Mexican with a broken arm hobbling along the road, who told me that a bull had charged him the day before and flung him into a water hole, breaking his arm and bruising him severely all over. The bull was a wild one from the mountains, and dangerously savage from some cause.

The Mexican warned me that he was doubtless still in the neighborhood, and that it would stand me in hand to keep a lookout for him. I had ridden a mile or two when I dismounted to drink of a little running stream I had reached, and to eat my lunch. My horse I left standing without taking the precaution of tying him, though without unsaddling him. He was a young mustang, as nervous as a woman, and, without any apparent cause that I could discover, threw up his head all of a sudden and broke down the valley in a mad gallop, carrying, of course, my saddle, with my belt containing my pistols, which I had rather foolishly removed from my waist an hour or two before, and hung from the horn of my saddle.

There was nothing for it but to follow the horse on foot, so off I put in as bad humor as you can imagine, for I was already fatigued by my long ride, and a tramp of perhaps miles was anything but inviting. I trudged on for an hour or two, until my feet were cut and blistered by the sharp rocks, and had sat down to rest near a clump of cottonwood trees, one of great size, and the rest of them mere saplings. At that moment I heard a loud roar and a crash in a bush behind me, and out rushed at a terrific pace a large bull, charging straight at me. I had only just time to throw myself to one side flat on the ground as he thundered by me. My next move was to make for the clump of cottonwoods, which I succeeded in reaching just as the bull turned again. My hat had fallen to the earth as I ran, and this the animal now attacked with a ferocity and maddened rage that showed how little mercy would be shown the man when his turn came.

Having torn the hat to pieces with horns and hoofs, and having smelled me out, he commenced a circuit round the trees, stamping, pawing and bellowing frightfully. With his bloodshot eyes and long, sharp horns, he looked like a demon. I was quite unarmed, having, by some unlucky chance, neglected to put in my knife in leaving home, and my pistols, as I said before, being in my saddle, and I was wearied unto death. The situation was a desperate one, and my only chance consisted in dodging the bull round the trees until he should be tired out, and this was, indeed, a faint hope, for the animal seemed fresh and warranted to outlast the strength of ten men. The bull charged again and again, sometimes coming against the tree with such force that he fell on his knees, sometimes bending the saplings behind which I stood until his horns almost reached me. There was not a branch of the one large tree low enough for me to seize and climb up, and I had no time in which to scale it between the bull's charges.

How long this awful game of "touch wood" lasted I cannot tell, for after the first excitement of self preservation passed off weariness again took possession of me, and it required all the instinct and love of life in me to keep me on my feet. Several times the bull left me for a few seconds, pacing suddenly away, bellowing his malignant discontent of my refusal to come forth and be trampled and gored to death, but before I could cross over to a better position he always came back at full speed. My tongue began to cleave to the roof of my mouth, my eyes grew hot and misty, my knees trembled under me, while a ringing in my ears warned me that nature was exhausted, and I felt it impossible to hold out until dark.

At length I grew desperate, and determined to make a run for the opposite covert the moment the bull turned from me again. I felt sure I was doomed, and thought of it until I actually began to welcome the idea of its ending in any way. The bull seemed to know I was worn out, and grew more rapid and fierce in his charges, but just when I was going to sit down under the great tree and let him do his worst, I heard the rattle of a horse among the rocks above, and a shout that sounded like the voice of an angel. Then came the barking of a dog and the loud reports of a stock whip, but the bull, with his devilish eyes fixed on me, never moved. Up came a horseman at full speed, and crack fell the lash on the bull's black hide, while the blood spurted out in a long streak. The animal turned savagely and charged the horseman, bellowing with astonished rage and pain, but the horse wheeled round just enough to baffle him—no more—and again the lash descended, cutting like a long flexible razor; but the infuriated bull was not to be beaten off with a whip—he charged again and again. But he had met his match, for right and left, as needed, the wiry Spanish mare turned, sometimes on her hind, sometimes on her fore legs. It was the most magnificent exhibition of equestrianism I ever saw, and I actually forgot my fatigue and exhaustion while I watched it.

My rescuer now shouted something, leaped from his horse and strode forward to meet the bull with an open knife between his teeth. As the beast lowered his head to charge, he seemed to catch him by the horns. There was a struggle, a cloud of dust, a stamping like two strong men wrestling. I could not see clearly, but the next moment the bull was on his back, with the blood welling from his throat and the limbs quivering in death. The stranger, covered with dust and blood, came up to me then, saying, apparently as unconscious of triumph as if he had been killing a calf in a slaughter house: "He's dead enough now, sir; he won't trouble anybody any more." I walked two or three paces towards the dead beast, when my senses failed me and I fainted. When I came to myself my horse was standing near me, tied to a bush, and my strange rescuer had withdrawn a few feet and was watching me intently. I went up to him, and thanking him for the service rendered me inquired the name of him to whom I owed my life. The man laughed a little and then replied: "Well, I don't mind telling you, under the circumstances. I am ——." No, I'll leave his name untold—he was an outlaw and a fugitive from justice, but he certainly saved me from a cruel death, and he was the finest horseman I ever saw.—Ysleta (Tex.) Cor. Atlanta Constitution.

I Think.

Do you? That is, do you reason or only dream?

I climbed up the other day to the top of a clock tower on one of our largest city buildings. Within a glazed closet on one side was the machinery of the most conspicuous, longest and oftenest consulted clock in town. High above the street roar, which came up in faint and muffled throbs, with an outlook over the vast wandering acres of a metropolitan district, in the perpetual blaze of a sunny day or the unbroken gray haze of misty weather, rivaling the moon by night, and brighter to the eye of man than the eternal siderial clock, whose dial is marked by celestial fires, is this thinking machine for mankind?

"I think for all," it seemed to say. "I am always serious. I never dream. I say time for breakfast, school and shop. Time for wedding, funeral and church. Time for banks to close and notes all paid or protested. Time for the dance, the theatre, the charity meeting, the drill, the doctor. No, I never muse, I never build air castles. I never fritter off my ticks, half thinking, half sleeping. Thought is results with me."

Well, it is not always so with the clock work in my head. I sometimes am in reverie. I often spend a great deal of time in mental inaction. Particularly when I'm smoking, or digesting my dinner, or resting my tired feet with slippers of ease which the baby has brought to me, and my eyes meanwhile wander about the room delighted with my family. "What are you thinking about?" asks my wife. I reply "Nothing. I am simply enjoying existence."

I judge this is right occasionally. It is right to sit and watch a sunset, thinking of nothing, but only taking in everything beautiful and restful—the splendor, the glory, the peace, the goodness of God—in the scene. I know it does me good now and then to dream out of a car window on the flying landscape, thinking of nothing in particular, but allowing the mind to wander on, as you have seen a colt wander over a pasture upland when he had cropped to his fill. We are too busy with the mind—that is, some of us. We do too much thinking and not enough dreaming. We wear out before our time thereby. We are always keeping time for somebody.—New York Weekly.

A Baptismal Incident.

Many St. Louisans who have been in business down town during the past decade will remember a familiar personage who used to be employed in one of the Fourth street offices. Jim was the address he usually got, and he was afflicted with a bad case of stuttering. Jim had a brother, George, who had the reputation of being the most consummate liar in the whole country about his home. It seemed as though he would go to more trouble to fabricate a story than to relate the naked facts. He was notorious wherever he was known for his habit, and little or no confidence was placed in any of his statements.

One winter before Jim came to St. Louis there was a great Baptist revival in the home town, and George was one of the converts. To become a good Baptist it was of course necessary that he should be immersed, and the ceremony was set for a bitter cold Sunday. The baptism was to take place at a small creek near town, and the ice had to be cut in order to perform the rite. Jim was on hand to see his prevaricating brother brought into the fold, and was perched in a commanding position on the bank. When George's turn came, and he was put under the freezing water, a voice was heard above the minister's and others, "G-G-George, is it c-c-cold?" "No," came the answer from the still unregenerated brother. "D-D-Dip him again, minister; he l-l-lies yet."—St. Louis Republic.

Human Testimony Erroneous.

Cyclists tell funny stories about evidence occasionally given in the courts as to the rate at which they are supposed to have been careering madly along the thoroughfares. The limits at present seem to lie between "a mile a minute" in a famous case and "as fast as a tram car"—the last being a lady's idea of the rider's dangerous rate of speed. But measurements of velocity and distance are not in everybody's line. Constable 411 H, who gave evidence in the Thames police court, was not strong on this point. He deposed that he was ten yards away when a defendant struck his wife, but when asked to point out a distance of ten yards indicated a space of about two yards and a half.

Then, when examined as to how many feet there were in a yard, he replied, "Twelve;" and on Mr. Mead putting the further interrogatory how many inches, the intelligent officer frankly admitted that his knowledge did not extend so far. The magistrate put the case back for further evidence, and eventually, on other testimony, sentenced the wife beater to six months' hard labor and made a separation order. Meanwhile it will perhaps come to be considered among the multitudinous necessary qualifications of the force to have a rudimentary knowledge of the table of superficies.—London Telegraph.

Power of Memory.

The point to which reliance on the memory may be carried safely by proper training is thus illustrated by Mr. Frederic Pincott: "Ranjit Singh could neither read nor write, but he knew all that was going on in every part of a kingdom as large as France. He was an able financier, and knew at all times accurately the contents of all his treasuries, the capacities of his large and varied provinces, the relative power of his neighbors, the strength and weakness of the English. The architectural triumphs of India were nearly all built by men who could neither read nor write.

"The Indian druggist may have hundreds of jars, one above the other from floor to ceiling, not one of them marked by label or ticket; yet he never hesitates placing his hand on the right vessel whenever a drug is required. The ordinary washermen go round to houses with their donkeys and collect the clothes, some from one house, some from another. These they convey to the river and wash, and in returning with the huge pile never fail to deliver each article to its rightful owner."—San Francisco Argonaut.

The Hair Should Not Be Wet.

Promiscuous washing and frequent wetting of the hair is very detrimental, especially sea bathing, unless the salt water should be carefully washed out of the hair with fresh, soft water and the hair carefully dried. Keeping the hair damp has an especially injurious effect, not only rendering it brittle and rough, but causing a disagreeable odor, which is annoying to every one, and which can be easily prevented.—Exchange.

James Wormley, whose name is perpetuated in the famous hotel in Washington, was a colored man and formerly a hackman. Making money at the business, he bought a few horses and vehicles and kept a livery stable, from which he accumulated a little fortune. Among his early business ventures was a small inn, out of which has grown the present hotel.

MESMERISM IN THE ORIENT.

Cruel Treatment of Two Hypnotized Natives.

NEEDLES THRUST THROUGH THE FLESH.

Cooking the Hands With Live Coals.—A Blood Curdling Scene.

There were ten years ago, and I presume are now, in India, mesmerists whose performances transcend in wonder the combined efforts of such of their Christian rivals as I have ever seen. Let me describe one performance:

It was in Secunderabad, in 1878, and it took place in the broad corridor of the palace of Saler Jung, the nyzam. I was one of a party of Englishmen, among whom were Dr. Crawford, surgeon of the British army, and Mr. John Hodgkins, formerly an officer in her majesty's Lancers, but at that time in the employ of an English banking and mercantile firm in Hong Kong. We were in the front ranks of the spectators, nearly all of whom were Europeans. After we had waited a few minutes, fanning ourselves, for the day was oppressively hot, the fakirs made their appearance. There were eight in the party. An old man with aquiline features, a patriarchal white beard and a pair of flashing black eyes, was the leader. His wife, a pretty little woman, young enough to be his daughter, was his chief assistant, and the six remaining men served as subjects and under assistants.

I had heard much about the wonderful performances of this particular band of fakirs, as all itinerant performers are generally termed, and thus when I received the invitation of the palace authorities I was delighted to accept it. But I must admit that all the praise I had heard seemed faint and cold after I had seen all that was to be seen. It was, taking it all in all, the most wonderful performance of the sort any of our party had ever witnessed.

After the fakirs arrived they proceeded at once to business. The old man bound a bandage tightly around the forehead of one of his young men, placing a small wedge shaped piece of pith under the cloth and directly between the eyes. Then he handed him a small round mirror, telling him to place it in his hand and gaze upon it intently. This the young man did. Meanwhile the other fakirs made a circle partially around him, droning a monotonous chant that ran something as follows:

Ram, ram, amaram, amaram, ram,
Amaram, amaram, amaram, ram.

This was repeated over and over again in singing tones, resembling the distant hum of a hive of bees, and when the chant was ended we were nearly as drowsy as the poor subject was.

Directly the song was finished we started from our lethargy and brought our lagging senses to bear upon the victim of this remarkable incantation. He was lying on the parlor floor, to all appearances dead. His face was of the ghastly pallor of the tomb. His arms, legs and fingers were as though they had been suddenly turned to ice. His blood seemed to have been frozen on a day when we living spectators were almost suffocated by the heat.

We felt his fingers. They were as rigid as though modeled from marble. Dr. Crawford raised his eyelids. The pupil had been upturned and nothing but the white was visible. The doctor examined his heart and felt his pulse. His blood had stopped flowing through his veins. To make the test even more complete the doctor stopped his nostrils, his eyes and his ears and mouth with a thick, putty like paste, that made breathing an impossibility. In every previous mesmeric or hypnotic experiment I had witnessed the subject always breathed.

Now came some further tests, and cruel ones they were, too. Large bodkins were thrust entirely through the palm of his hand, and he never moved a muscle. Neither did a single drop of blood follow the withdrawal of the steel. This prodding was repeated upon his cheeks, his finger points, his thighs and arms, with precisely the same results. Then the old man took a glowing coal of burning charcoal from his pot and placed it on the upturned palm of his unconscious victim's hand. Here it at first smoked, then sizzled, and the corridor became permeated with the odor of burning human flesh. Still the man was unconscious. At last the doctor forced the old man to remove the coal, for fear that it might do the young man some permanent injury.

The subject was then turned over to the doctor's care. The physician made every effort known to medical science to resuscitate him, but all for naught. After he had been in this trance for nearly an hour the old fakir made some wide spreading passes over his body with his arms and leaned back to watch the result. A shiver passed over the subject's form, and a grim smile of triumph curled the corners of the old man's mouth. We gathered around the prostrate man and watched him until we grew sick at heart and felt faint. Such torture, such horrible agony I never before beheld on a human being's face. His features were twisted and distorted out of all human resemblance. His limbs became knotted, and he writhed into a thousand different shapes from his finger tips to his toes. After five minutes, that seemed to us an age, he opened his eyes, rubbed the moisture from his forehead and sat up as one dazed. A minute later he rose and took his place among the others as though nothing whatever had happened.

While this was very wonderful, the old man now proceeded to astonish us still more. With no one to help him save the singers and their chant, of his own volition he threw himself into this same marvelous state. We repeated the same experiments upon him that we had done in the first instance. We drove steels through his limbs and scorched the palm of his hand with a living coal. We stopped up his nostrils, ears, eyes and mouth, and then the doctor worked on him for half an hour or more. The effect of death was in this case more pronounced than in the former. The natural pallor of the old man's face, his flowing white hair and beard made him appear like the carved figure of some old Indian chieftain in one of the royal burial grounds. It impressed us as though we were in the presence of actual death, and we instinctively spoke in whispers.

The boodler, Bruner, has been arrested and brought into Court like an ordinary thief. He will now have to stand trial, and it remains to be seen if a jury of twelve honest men can be got to convict him and a Judge to sentence him to the full measure of punishment he deserves.

An attempt is to be made in San Francisco to put a stop to the tug boat marriage business. What would be the use of it? As long as parents neglect to give their children any moral training on the subject of marriage they will find a way to become married every tug boat were swept out of existence.

Political conventions are packed by men who are professional politicians; just as some men are professional gamblers or professional burglars, and the result is, "Brunerism". Bruner to political managers was as marked cards to gamblers or a "Jimmy" to a burglar. Being himself a "professional" he got a share of the "swag" not only a share. There are much bigger rascals back of Bruner, hence the difficulty in bringing him to justice.

Judge Trout has impaneled another Grand Jury, and the Examiner says some of the members are as much friends of boodlers as the rascals who were exposed on the two former Grand Juries. If San Francisco shall be relieved from the control of the thieves and their tools in office who have brought infamy not only upon the City but upon the whole State, the greatest part of the credit will be due to the Examiner. There was no other power in the State strong enough and honest enough to cope with the boodlers.

One great danger is ahead of boodle Bruner in his trial. If the big politicians who are behind him are satisfied that his usefulness as a tool is at an end, they will abandon him to his fate, and he may be convicted. If they think, however, that they can still use him, a trial will be useless. He will never be convicted. Among thieves, whether politicians or pickpockets, there is no such thing as honor. Peaching on pals is as common as pilfering; if a confederate of Bruner could be "got dead to rights" as detectives say, the whole story could be got by a promise of security for the informer.

The anti-Chinese bills and the silver bills in Congress show how very little influence the great body of voters have in making laws. The millionaires want Chinamen brought in because they cheapen labor; the workingmen want them excluded for the same reason. But in Congress the millions of the few rich have vastly more influence than the millions of poor men. C. P. Huntington telegraphs political switchmen in Congress to watch anti-Chinese bills, and they are watched. If the switchmen should fail to disobey they would be switched—in the next nominating convention. If put to a popular vote a majority of voters would be in favor of free coinage of silver. But the wealth of capitalists is greatly interested by the single gold standard. Vested wealth rules Congress; therefore all efforts to secure free coinage fail. In the United States the forms of free government afford a safety-valve for the escape of dangerous discontent in the excitement of political contests. In European countries not even the forms of liberty exist. Therefore discontent takes the form of conspiracies, plots of anarchists dynamite bombs and so forth. Here we "whoop 'er up" at election times, curse and lie about our opponents, dress for parades like lunatics, listen to stupid, silly nonsense of stump speakers, feel that we have done our whole duty as intelligent Americans should and are satisfied. So are the professional politicians who have used us, profited by our gullability and laugh at us in secret.

An Ingenious Swindle.

Tax Collector Andrew Bouchou, of Hancock, turned over as a part of his funds to Supervisor Wheeler Jan. 12 a paper bank note. It passed for a twenty dollar bill, and but for the watchfulness of the cashier in Nichols' banking house, in this village, it might have gone unchallenged. The cashier at once discovered that the front of the bill was a twenty, but the back was a five. They were the split halves of two genuine bank notes pasted together. The schemer's profit will depend on whether he passes the mate to it for twenty dollars by proffering back up. By doing so he will have made fifteen dollars clear on the transaction. The collector had taken it in for taxes.—Hancock (N. Y.)

A Paris Telephone Company.

In Paris the idea of entertainments by telephone has been so far developed that a company has been formed to provide a theater telephone service. Instruments are placed in clubs, hotels, cafes and restaurants, and various performances are constantly on tap. By dropping a half franc into a slot the vicarious theater goer obtains communication with his favorite playhouse for five minutes, and if he times his connection properly he can hear the song which has become the hit of the season at a very small charge. A private service of a similar nature is also contemplated, and before long it will be quite natural for a host to give a theater party in his own drawing room.

There is always a peculiar fascination for the general public in listening by means of the telephone to entertainments which are given at a distance. One of the most attractive features of electrical exhibitions is always the telephone section, where a number of telephones provide entertainments "on tap" from theaters and concert halls. This was particularly noticeable at the Paris electrical exhibition held some years ago, and at the Lenox lyceum in New York. The telephone section was crowded all the evening with delighted listeners.—Electricity.

The Struggle for Bread in Vienna.

The distribution of bread to the poor of Vienna took place Tuesday between 11 o'clock and noon, in order to make sure that only the unemployed received alms. Though 6,200 large loaves, which had cost 1,200 florins, or £100, were given out, several hundred starving people had to go away empty handed. The scenes witnessed were perhaps the worst that have occurred as yet. It was pitiable in the extreme to see wretchedly clad women, with babies in arms, and children, fighting as for their lives for a loaf of bread, into which, hot as it was from the bakery, they cut like hungry wolves.

Similar scenes were witnessed at the distribution of bread to men. About twenty people fainted in the crush, and those who saw the bitter disappointment of the many who, after waiting for hours, finally received nothing, will never forget the spectacle of human misery and want. Four thousand two hundred loaves were given away yesterday, when the crush was so enormous that a number of poor women, with babies in their arms, and several old men fainted away and required medical attendance.—Vienna Cor. London Standard.

A Big Ferry on Lake Michigan.

A marine experiment of great importance to Milwaukee is announced. The Toledo, Ann Arbor and Northern Michigan railroad is about to build a large ferry steamer to test the feasibility of carrying trains of cars across Lake Michigan from Kewaunee to Frankfort. The new steamer will cost a quarter of a million of dollars, and will be large enough to carry forty freight cars, and she is to be fast enough to make the runs across the lake between the points named in about five hours. The distance is sixty miles.

The ferrying of cars in this manner will result in a great saving, as it costs from six to twelve dollars a car to make the transfer of freight from the cars to the steamers, and besides, the loss through breakage incident to such transfers will be prevented. It is thought the experiment will prove successful, as freight trains have been thus transferred for years between Cape Charles City and Newport News, a distance of forty miles, across the mouth of Chesapeake bay, where the water is sometimes very turbulent.—Milwaukee Wisconsin.

An Imperial Chemist.

Prince Lucien Bonaparte has bequeathed to England his precious collection of mineral and chemical products. This collection contains specimens of the very greatest value on account of their rarity, among these being pieces of gold and platinum which are absolutely pure.

But the gems of the collections are two specimens of those exceedingly rare metals—iridium and germanium. The former, which is worth three times the price of platinum, is as large as a horse chestnut. As to the piece of germanium, although smaller in size, its enormous value will be understood when one reflects that it is worth sixty times its weight in gold.

The whole collection was prepared in the prince's laboratory, he making the most difficult experiments with his own hands, for he was one of the most distinguished chemists of the day. It is interesting to note that his chief and almost his only assistant in his chemical researches was his wife, the princess.—New York Herald.

Delightful Mr. Einstein.

The truly democratic form of our government, in which "one man is as good as another," was illustrated in a little incident at the Capitol the other day. A subcommittee of the house appropriations committee having charge of certain branches of the District expenditures had before them recently that distinguished citizen of the District of Columbia, the official dog catcher, known as Poundmaster Einstein, with the purpose of slicing down his salary from the princely sum of $1,200 a year to $900.

It did not slice, however, and one of the members of the committee explains their change of heart by saying that before the examination was concluded Mr. Einstein so charmed the members of the committee with his stories of excursions made with senators in search of black bass in the streams about Washington that the question of reducing his salary was absolutely abandoned.

"We want him to come again," said one of the committeemen, "and as for his salary, we would not cut him down a dollar."—Washington Cor. Albany Journal.

Tent and Overcoat in One.

A new tent is about to be introduced into the German army, the novel feature of which is that it is divisible into two portions, each half being arranged so as to be used as an overcoat by the soldiers in case of rain while on the march.—Paris Letter.

The Grip Cured Him.

CHARLEY'S PRECIOUS HAIR.

He had the air of a man of the world. His dress was becoming and not too showy. He seemed to be an individual who had dined well, who would tell good stories at the club.

Stretched out in the barber's chair in the hairdresser's room on School street, instead of settling down with that indifferent, self satisfied air that usually comes over a man in that situation, he seemed troubled. He looked about from chair to chair, and yet he was not happy. The barber shaved him and was so impressed that he even forgot to talk him to death. Then the man sat bolt upright in the chair and took an envelope from his pocket. It was scented; the barber could tell that. It was written in a lady's hand too.

The strange man opened it, took out a note, read it over and over again, then from its folds withdrew a lock of hair. It was golden, and the victims who were waiting for their turn in the chair saw him kiss the sunny lock and put it back in the envelope.

"Hair cut?" asked the barber, as he rubbed the tufts of hair which surrounded a bald spot on the strange man's head.

"No, no, not for the world," he replied, "I cannot spare any."

"Man in next chair has hair like yours, only a little more of it," suggested the barber.

"By Jove, he has," said the troubled man, and he darted out of his seat and almost jumped to the occupant of the next chair.

"Going to have a hair cut?" asked the strange man.

"No," was the rather curt reply.

"Well, will you have a hair cut at my expense?" said the man without hesitation. "I must send my best girl a lock of hair, and I can't spare mine. Come, how much is it worth?" and the eyes of the colored boy who brushes coats bulged out beyond his forehead.

The barber began his work, and a lock of the man's hair was handed over to the stranger, who put it in a little silver locket that bore a monogram. Then, when the work was finished the two walked out together.

The stranger was smiling contentedly, the clubman grinned, the barber laughed and the customers gazed on in astonishment.

"Wasn't Charley a dear, good fellow to keep his promise and send me a lock of his hair?" said the pretty girl that night as she took the daintiest sort of a lock from the little box. And all was still but for the beating of her faithful heart.—Boston Herald.

Feelings of a Monkey.

A native of India was sitting in his garden when a loud chattering announced the arrival of a large party of monkeys, which forthwith proceeded to make a meal off his fruits. Fearing the loss of his entire crop, he fetched his fowling piece, and, to frighten them away, fired it off, as he thought, over the heads of the chattering crew. They all fled away, but, he noticed, left behind upon a bough, what looked like one fallen asleep, with its head resting upon its arms.

As it did not move, he sent a servant up the tree, who found that it was dead, having been shot through the heart. He had it fetched down and buried beneath the tree, and on the morrow he saw sitting upon the little mound the mate of the dead monkey. It remained there for several days bewailing its loss.—Robert Morley in Nature Notes.

The Romans Did Not Use Soap.

The Romans were not acquainted with the use of regular soap, but they employed an alkali, with which the greasy dirt was dissolved out of their clothes. This alkali, called nitrum, is referred to by Pliny, but the cheapest solvent was urine, which was mostly used. The clothes were put in this, mixed with water and then stamped upon with the feet. This process was performed by old people, while boys lifted the clothes out of the tubs. The white garments, after being washed, were subjected to the vapor of sulphur, being stretched on a frame and the sulphur burned beneath. Poor people in Rome cleansed their bodies with meal of lupins, called lomentum, which, with common meal, is still used in some places for that purpose.—Knowledge.

Early Printing and Illustrating.

The first printing press in the United States began its civilizing work at Cambridge, Mass., in Harvard university in 1639. The first American made illustration, it is still believed, is in Tully's Almanac, of Boston, in 1698. The first American copper plate portrait published in this country was in Increase Mather's "Ichabod," published in 1703. The first three engravers were Paul Revere, Benjamin Franklin and Isaiah Thomas, who distinguished himself at the battle of Lexington.—New York Sun.

Why Some Babies Cry.

A great many babies cry out of pure cussedness. They have no reason whatever. I have seen them stop playing to begin to howl, refusing both food and drink. Often a child will wake up, begin crying, and fall off to sleep again. Babies show individuality, and cry just as adults grumble, scold, lecture, bang things about and swear. There may or may not be cause for the outburst, but there is a certain amount of relief which has a physiological if not a moral value.—Cor. Baby.

Irish and Germans Eat Potatoes.

Ireland leads the world with a potato eating capacity of 1,320 pounds for each man, woman and child, while Americans eat but 150 pounds per head annually. The Germans are great eaters of the vegetable, their consumption being over 1,000 pounds per head each year.—Good Housekeeping.

Have you written me yet? If you have not, write to-day. I address you on my special, personal situation. I undertake to help each any fairly intelligent person of either sex, who can read and write, and who, after instruction, will work industriously, how to earn three Thousand Dollars a year in their own localities, wherever they live. I will also furnish the situation or employment, at which you can earn that amount. I charge nothing and receive nothing unless successful, as above. Nothing difficult to learn, or that requires much time. I desire but one person from each district of county. I have already taught and provided with employment a large number who are making over Three thousand dollars a Year, each. All is new, solid, sure. Full particulars Free. After you know all, if you conclude to go no further, why, no harm is done. Address,
E. C. ALLEN, Box 420, Augusta, Maine.

$6000.00 a year is being made by John R. Goodwin, Troy, N.Y., at work for us. Reader, you may not make as much, but we can teach you quickly how to earn from $5 to $10 a day at the start, and more as you go on. Both sexes. All ages. In any part of America, you can commence at home, giving all your time, or spare moments only to the work. All is new. Great pay $1.00 for every worker. We start you, furnishing everything. EASILY, PLEASANTLY and PROFITABLY earned. PARTICULARS FREE. Address at once, GEORGE STINSON & CO., PORTLAND, MAINE.

DIED.

TRACEY—Near Big Pine, April 30, 1892, Katie Tracey, aged about 30 years.

Charley Green was up from Lone Pine yesterday.

Jas. C. and Ed. M. Crocker visited Independence and Lone Pine during the week.

C. Mulholland got home from Los Angeles yesterday. His health is fully restored.

P. H. Mack leaves to-morrow for San Francisco. He will be absent about two weeks.

Regular stated meeting of Inyo Lodge, No. 221, F. & A. M. to-morrow night at Masonic Hall.

The sheep men are beginning to arrive. Quite a number have been in town during the week buying supplies.

Mr. and Mrs. Frank Fitzgerald visited Independence early in the week. They expect to return to Modock on Monday.

Mrs. J. J. Gunn and little daughter arrived from Modock last Saturday. Mrs. Gunn is visiting at Georges Creek with her parents.

Dr. L. L. Woodin went to Keeler on Wednesday to attend Mrs B F Gray. She returned yesterday morning and reports her patient much improved.

A car-load of ore was sent north from Keeler yesterday morning. Mr. J. J. Gunn has several car-loads of ore ready for shipment from Minietta.

In this issue will be found the professional card of Walter A. Lamar Esq. Mr. Lamar will give careful and prompt attention to all legal affairs entrusted to him.

The Democratic County Central Committee meets at Independence to-morrow, for the purpose of appointing delegates to the State Convention. See the published call.

Mrs. Thomas Brady has been in very poor health for a long time past, and in the hope that a change of climate would prove beneficial she started for Gilroy, Santa Clara county, last Tuesday morning.

Mr. H. M. Conger and Mr. C. Persons came up by stage from Los Angeles on Wednesday. They are varying the pleasures of life by a visit from the orange groves to the snow-crowned Sierras.

The large building at the water station, six miles north from Mojave, was totally destroyed by fire recently. Some sheep men had been camped at the place, and it is believed the fire was started from their camp.

Capt. J. D. Channell came in from Panamint on Tuesday's train. He spent Wednesday examining the Kearsarge and Rex Montes mills in the canyons west of town, and started for Candelaria, where he is interested in mining ventures, yesterday morning.

The Mojave and Keeler stage has so many passengers to carry that more accommodation has to be provided. The stage up on Wednesday evening had to carry passengers three on a seat. This would not have been at all unpleasant if they had not all been of the unpleasant sex.

The annual meeting of the stockholders of the Lone Pine Canal Co. was held last Saturday. Thos. Boland, P. H. Mack, J. A. McKenzie E. Robinson and D. Holland were elected Directors. The Board of Directors elected the following officers:—E. Robinson, President; Thomas Boland, Treasurer; P. H. Mack, Secretary.

A traveling man who chanced to be in the store of E. V. Wood, at McKees Rocks Pa., says while he was waiting to see Mr. Wood, a little girl came in with an empty bottle labeled Chamberlain's Pain Balm and said: "Mamma wants another bottle of that medicine; she says it is the best medicine for rheumatism she ever used." 50 cent bottles for sale by

The Brazzanovich Case.

The Hawthorne Bulletin says: "On Tuesday the Grand Jury found an indictment against Martin Brazzanovich for murder for the killing of Wm. L. Robson at Sodaville on the 27th of January last.

"Brazzanovich was arraigned to answer the charge and pleaded not guilty. By arrangement of counsel the trial was begun at once.

"Hon. Pat. Reddy was attorney for Brazzanovich and District Attorney Bowler appeared for the State

"Sabina Robson was the first witness called for the prosecution. She testified that on the night of the shooting she was on the porch a few feet from Brazzanovich's door, heard loud talking, saw a flash and heard a pistol shot, saw Robson in a reclining position in a chair; heard Robson say, 'Martin, you have killed me;' ran screaming for aid; when I returned Robson had been taken to McIntyre's saloon.

"On cross-examination Mrs. Robson said: 'Wm. Robson was my husband; was married to him by contract in Candelaria in 1879; Archie Turner drew the contract, and it was witnessed by Mahoy and another man. Turner and both witnesses were dead, and the marriage contract burned up. In October or November Brazzanovich gave me a deed of his property at Sodaville.'

"On Tuesday afternoon the case was given to the jury. They were out until yesterday at noon, when they stated that they could not agree, and rendered a verdict of eight for acquittal and four for manslaughter. Judge Rising then dismissed them and put Brazzanovich under $5,000 to appear for retrial."

Mr. J. P. Blaize, an extensive real estate dealer in Des Moines, Iowa, narrowly escaped one of the severest attacks of pneumonia while in the northern part of that State during a recent blizzard, says the Saturday Review. Mr. Blaise had occasion to drive several miles during the storm and was so thoroughly chilled that he was unable to get warm, and inside of an hour after his return he was threatened with a severe case of pneumonia or lung fever. Mr. Blaize sent to the nearest drug store and got a bottle of Chamberlain's Cough Remedy, of which he had often heard, and took a number of large doses. He says the effect was wonderful and that in a short time he was breathing quite easily. He kept on taking the medicine and in a few days was able to come to Des Moines. Mr. Blaize regards his cure as simply wonderful. 50 cent bottles for sale by

No great efforts are made by other manufacturers to procure and use pure materials.

It is true that one other company has the facilities, but its greed and cupidity induced it in an evil hour to use ammonia, in order to swell its profits. Hence the Price Baking Powder Company stands alone in its fight for a pure baking powder.

No other article of human food receives greater care in its production, or has attained higher perfection. Dr. Price's Cream is surely a perfect baking powder. Free from every taint of impurity. No other article used in the kitchen has so many steadfast friends among the housewives of America.

"LUNA."

Beautiful moonlight, silently bright,
Hail peaceful eventide, beautiful night!
Soft as thy splendor, quiet, serene—

O thou argent moon that seemest to smile,
Erstwhile thou hast laughed on the land of the Nile,
O'er the tombs of the ages, o'er the ruins of power;
On the decay of empire unheeding the hour.

A vision of Eden, effulgent, subdued,
As fresh in pure beauty as the morning rose hued,
Thou wak nest the feelings that brook our control;
Hail beautiful moonlight, thou touchest the soul.

Man buildeth in glory his palaces grand,
With city the tombs he empeoples the land:
O'er the wave spreads the "white wings" of commerce and war,
But thou glideth on forever afar.

Elysian sweet dwell in thy soft beam by night,
And fairy like shadows play in thy soft light,
Till thy spell of enchantment steals o'er each fond breast,
And calmly and sweetly in dreams sinks to rest.

THE GOLDEN SWAN.

The gentleman from the north said that he would give me a penny a word if I would write out the story as I know it and as the poor dear told it to me before she died. Nothing would induce me to do it if I was as able as I am willing to provide for the dear boy she left in my care. He has given me $20 already, to encourage me; and that means 2,000 words! I wonder how many pages it will take to hold that many words? I told the gentleman that I was no scholar, but he said: "Neither am I." And then he told me to write it just as if I were speaking to a dear friend, or my daughter, or my husband; to just "look into" my "heart and write."

But the gentleman—God bless him!—when he told me to write as if I were speaking to my daughter or husband didn't know that they were both in heaven—I was going to say, before he was born—and that I was left, long ago, to fade, like the golden swan over the door, and wither and die alone. I find it pretty hard, sometimes, to make the boy and myself comfortable. He is a good boy, and that's the reason I can't bear to see him a waiting on the customers; and that's the reason why I could never let him do what I would, of course, expect from a commonplace boy in return for his food and clothes and board. He's been going to school now these three years—ever since he was 10 years old, and he is the finest and most popular scholar in his class, they say.

"Oh," he says, "I'll be a man some day, auntie, and then we'll see about us two!"

If I know anything about human nature—and I ought to, seeing it drunk and sober under this roof for over fifty years—I do not think that my boy will forget me when I become too old to be of much account, for he's a good boy and a brave boy and a frank, honest boy, and he's bound to get along in the world, because he isn't afraid of anything he ever saw. I never knew such a boy. He got his courage from his mother and his high sense of honor from his father.

And that brings me to the story.

Well, I must tell it in my own way. It has taken me two days to get as far as this. You can't order a story, expecting to receive it as you would a "golden buck." If you get it as quickly as all that it won't be worth reading, I guess. These hard, rough fingers of mine are more used to plates, knives and forks and tobies than to a penholder. Only for the boy I'd stop right here; but the snow will soon be flying and the north wind sighing across the frozen lake, through the naked trees and around the gables of the Swan, and my boy must have a warm overcoat and stout boots, and, for Christmas, a pair of skates. His dear little warm, red heart is so set on a pair of skates! He sees all the other boys having a good time every winter on the lake and he envies them, but with no mean envy. His envy, like everything else about him, is of the generous kind.

That is like his dear mother again. And he never saw her. I am the only mother he has ever known. Well, I've tried my best. I remember the night well. It is nearly fourteen years ago now. Cranford Douglas (and a wilder gentleman Virginia never produced) was in here with a crowd of his friends almost as wild as himself. Ah! that was the generous crowd! I was younger then, and was considered rather rosy and plump and pleasing. You might not believe it, but I really used to flirt a good deal with my customers of the first water then. Why, it was business. I loved my husband; but if I had been straight, severe and prim or sour where would the Swan be?

No, I cannot forget that night. Mr. Douglas, Mr. Cram Fennell, Mr. Jarvis McVey and Col. Ralph Forrest sat at the largest table in the room out there. They were none the better for the liquor they had drunk. They were very wild and very boastful, I must say, much as I dislike to, for brave men shouldn't boast, and every one of them was as brave as a lion.

Well, as the night grew older, my gentlemen grew wilder, and finally they got talking about women. Now, that is something I always dislike to hear discussed in a tavern; it is too delicate a subject. Women should never be spoken of there. Something is sure to be said by some one of an offensive nature, and some one is, nine times in a dozen, ready to flare up and take offense at what is said. It was the way that night. First, they spoke of the great women of the world, of the young girl who left her home, over 400 years ago, in man's clothes, with her long hair cut off and the courage of a god in her soul, to save her beloved country from one of England's wicked kings. Col. Forrest did stoutly maintain that she was an inspired and simple virgin, and Mr. Cranford Douglas did as strongly assert that she was an artful hussy and a lewd minx, God bless us!

They called her "Joan the Rip"—that is, Mr. Cranford Douglas did; Col. Forrest and Mr. Jarvis McVey did call her "the sweet maid of Orleans." Then they spoke of a woman for whom "a thousand ships" were launched, and ever so many battles fought in some far away country called Troy, I think it was. Then they tore a poor woman all to pieces—who had been dead, I guess, over two thousand years—for loving more than one man. They called her a "serpent" of some river—all but Col. Forrest; they couldn't get him to say one single unkind thing about any of my sex, not even when they brought up a woman who had killed a very brutal man in a bath tub early one fine morning. He said that "it served the cuss right," and that "Charlotte was just as good as Joan," and Mr. Cranford Douglas, with a great big oath and a thump on the table that broke six glasses and a finger bowl, said that "she was no better than she ought to be, or than the majority of women." The colonel said that only angels were better than they ought to be.

It pained me to hear them talk, but what could I do? And besides I knew Mr. Douglas didn't mean one-half that he said. I was sure that he wasn't talking, but that the liquor was. Well, they went from one great woman to another, and at last came down to that day—that is, that time—and they spoke of the women then in the public's eye.

Mr. Douglas gave it as his opinion that there wasn't a decent woman on the stage, God bless us! But here Mr. Cram Fennell begged to differ with him, and named one whom even I—shut out from the world as I was all my life, you might say—had heard of as being one of the sweetest, loveliest, purest and best of women and actresses. Not that I care much for that sort, and not that I don't. I have no knowledge of actors, because I have never been inside of a theatre in my life. After that actress was spoken of as being all that a good woman should be, Mr. Cranford Douglas burst into the maddest and most insulting laugh it has ever been my ill fortune to listen to; and when he was asked what the laugh meant he shouted so that the horses of the gentlemen were disturbed out there under the shed:

And then a gentleman—the very handsomest gentleman I have ever seen, who had been eating a chop and quietly reading a paper at a little table by himself—got up, came over to Mr. Douglas' party, and with a very white face, which showed that his heart must have been going up and down at a dreadful rate, he told Mr. Cranford Douglas that he thought that Mr. Cranford was a blackguard and a vile liar!

I thought that I should faint. I couldn't do anything, and my Dick couldn't interfere with gentlemen. If they were every day people, now, something might be done; but these gentlemen were of the best blood in Virginia.

So Mr. Cranford says, as cool as pie:

"And whom have I the honor of listening to?"

"You wouldn't recognize me, because my father happened to be a gentleman."

"But how do I know that?" says Mr. Douglas.

"True, how should you?" replies the pale gentleman. "A gentleman always resents an insult offered to himself or friends, be the latter absent—or present, unable to resent it themselves. You have slandered to-night one of the truest women God ever kissed ere he sent out of paradise. I do not allude to Joan of Arc or Charlotte Corday, but to a woman of today; and I tell you that you are a liar and a rowdy—well dressed and educated, but still a rowdy."

I never saw anything in my life done so quickly. Mr. Cranford leaped from his chair, and before he touched the ground his open hand struck with a great force the pale gentleman's cheek.

The latter never moved. They both glared at each other. The pale gentleman said:

"That means"——

"It certainly does!" from Mr. Cranford Douglas.

"Well, I am a stranger in these parts, and if I might request any gentleman here to—to—to"——

"That's all right, Forrest," said Mr. Cranford; "just what I would have asked you to do if I intended that your services should be required. But they won't be. I believe that the choice is mine. Here, woman," to me, "get two of those little balls in the billiard room—a white and a black. Now, sir, here is a white ball and a black. If you draw the black ball from this mug," reaching over and taking one of my silver mugs from the hook where it, with four others, always hangs for ornament, "you will pass your word of honor to dispose of yourself by shooting, hanging, drowning, poison or by stabbing at any time I may elect after the drawing. If I draw the black ball you can dispose of me. I do this because I fancy you are not a skillful swordsman."

A faint smile played under the pale gentleman's silky mustache at that.

"And I wish to take no unfair advantage, for I am considered, rightly or wrongly, the best in Virginia. You may be a good shot, but I doubt it. Draw, sir—or shall I?"

"As you please."

"Very well; you draw."

The pale gentleman drew the black ball.

"Now, sir," said Mr. Cranford Douglas, "it is midnight. One year from to-night, at one minute after 12 o'clock, you must not be in this world. You must send me word that you are dead. Here is my card. Ah, thanks." And after exchanging cards they separated, and the pale gentleman went out, after paying me twice over for the little he had eaten, with the saddest smile and the sweetest I have ever seen.

I never saw him any more.

The months flew by after that as I have never in my long life known them to fly before. My sympathies were all with the pale gentleman, I must say, for I am not one of those that like to hear men run down their mothers' sex. But Mr. Cranford Douglas was a very generous man. He spent money as if he didn't know what it was to ever want for a dollar; and in truth he didn't, for he was of a very wealthy family.

Just one year from that night Mr. Cranford and his friends were seated out there, waiting for a message from the pale gentleman. Mr. Cranford said quietly that he would wager his horse that no message would come; and Mr. Cram Fennell said that he thought the message would come, as the pale gentleman seemed to be thoroughbred. The hours went on until 12 struck. At two minutes past 12 exactly, as I am an honest woman, and just in the middle of one of Mr. Cranford's disagreeable sneers about man's honor being on a par with woman's, the voice of the pale gentleman was distinctly heard to say:

"I have kept my word."

We all looked toward the door. No one had entered. The wind wailed outside, and that was all we heard after. The party looked at each other mutely, as people do look when something is said that cannot be grasped all at once, and then with a big, round oath Mr. Cranford Douglas did accuse some one in the party of being a "ventriloquist," but they all swore in their beards that they were guilty of no trick, and so he tried to appear as if he believed that which they said. In a little while they left the Swan, and Dick and I locked up and went to bed, wondering and whispering until we fell asleep.

About a month after that, one snowy, blowy night in the wild December weather, two days before Christmas I think it was, at about 11 o'clock, when Mr. Douglas and Col. Forrest and the rest of the gentry were laughing and chatting and telling wild stories of wilder times, the door of the Swan was thrown violently open and there entered, in a whirl of snowflakes, a gentleman that looked for all the world like the cavaliers I used to see when I was a little girl long before the war came. He had on a soft, broad brimmed, low crowned hat; he was well made; he had on a great cloak and high, strong boots that came over his knees and large gloves that came over his wrists. He drew off one very slowly and warmed his delicate white hand at the great open fire, glancing round with his big gray eyes in every corner of the room and on every face at once, it seemed.

"A wild night, dame," he said to me.

"It is indeed, sir," says I. "Can I get something for you to eat and drink, sir?"

"Not just yet," he answered, kindly. "I came here to your tavern on business only."

When he said, "I came on business only," it sounded just like the farrier's hammer striking the anvil at the forge down the road. I grew very nervous. Something was in the very air that made everybody quiet. He looked at Mr. Cranford Douglas and his party as if he were trying to recognize some one of them. He then blew the melted snowflakes out of his whiskers by a peculiar movement of his mouth, as if he were trying to blow specks off his shirt front, stamped his feet, and then said to me, loud enough to be heard by all:

"You are pretty well acquainted in these parts, dame?"

"I ought to be, sir," I says, with pardonable pride, I hope, "seeing I was born here in the Swan, which my father and his kept before me."

"Perhaps you know one Mr. Cranford Douglas?"

Before I could reply Mr. Douglas arose and said rather stiffly, which I could see no earthly reason for:

"I do not think that she knows two Mr. Cranford Douglases, sir. What is your business with me?"

"So you are Mr. Cranford Douglas? Well I have a message for you, which I have brought over three thousand miles. You should have had it a month ago, sir; but England is far away, and I have just come from there to New York, from New York to you. There is your message, sir!"

"Fennell, will you oblige me by reading aloud the contents of that envelope?" said Mr. Cranford, quite calmly; but the devil was in his eyes all the same. And then Mr. Cram Fennell read:

The year is gone. In two minutes I shall be dead. WALTER MARLOWE.

"You," to the stranger, "were evidently his friend?" said Mr. Douglass.

"His dearest," was the measured reply.

"And you wish to take up his quarrel?"

A nod from the stranger.

"Very well. My friend, Col. Forrest, will wait upon any friend of yours in the morning"——

Mr. Douglas shrugged his shoulders, as much as to say, "As you will."

Well, the conditions were the same as those of a year and a month before, when the pale gentleman drew the black ball.

"Stay," said Mr. Cranford Douglas, as he was about to draw; "tell me, have you a friend to avenge you? I ask out of mere curiosity."

His tones were like ice.

Mr. Cranford Douglas did draw the black ball.

With a reckless laugh he shouted:

"Well, that's hard luck! Just to think, in one year I must die! But what a year I'll live!"

"Nay, sir, you must blow your brains out here in five minutes or put a bullet through your heart. It's all one to me so you are out of the world."

"Well, if I do," roared Mr. Cranford, "may I be everlastingly roasted!"

"You cur!" said the stranger, with a contemptuous sneer. "And to think that Walter Marlowe kept faith with such a thing as you!"

Oh, the words were bitter—bitter—bitter. I understood after. I don't know how they arranged it, but they met next morning off there in the clearing, near the lake, and Mr. Cranford wounded the stranger so badly that he had to fly the country. We have never heard of Mr. Cranford since except once, and then we learned that he was in the silver mines of South America. Yes, now I do remember that some one said he went down in a diving bell, on a wager, to a wreck off the South American coast, and that some of his drunken companions cut the air tube while he was down and flung it overboard.

The poor, dear, wounded thing was carried in here by Col. Forrest and Jarvis McVey, bleeding awfully, and up to my chamber. That day, along toward night, my boy was born. I didn't think that he would live, but the doctor said that he wished he was as sure of the mother's life as he was of her boy's. She lingered on for a few days—five, I think—and then passed away. I learned, by shreds and patches, her story, partly from her ravings and partly from what she told me.

The pale gentleman was her husband. She was the actress Mr. Cranford had said was "the worst of the lot" that night. Her husband was an English gentleman, and a very fine actor. He would have been a very great one had he lived. It was lucky for Mr. Douglas that he understood her husband's play with the sword, for if they had fought with swords instead of those little balls of ivory Mr. Douglas would have been surely killed by Mr. Marlowe, for Mr. Marlowe was the best swords man in his profession, excepting a Mr Fechter, if I remember rightly.

Only a few knew that they were married, because they thought that it was best so for a while; for the public doesn't think so much of a married actress as of an unmarried one. That seems very funny; I don't understand that at all. Well, they used to play together in Shakespeare's plays, and her husband was bound to become the best player of the part of Prince Hamlet since Mr. Edmund Kean's day.

After Mr. Marlowe went away that night he went to his wife (they were visiting some of his friends over yonder) and told her just what had happened. She took him up north with her next day and tried to talk and reason with him, but it was of no use. Then they gave up all their engagements, gave out that they had been married for some time and went to England, his home, where his great relations lived. She thought on the way over that he had forgotten all about it, but they were only one day over there when he shot himself. It nearly killed her. She loved him so.

Women always do love their husbands when they know that their husbands' characters are not quite so strong as their own, with a sort of motherly love mixed with the wifely. I know that's the way I feel toward my poor Dick. I don't think I would have had the same feeling toward him if I knew that he didn't look up to me.

It is all so sad. I can't write any more. I would be sorry I wrote this, only that my boy must have comfortable clothes, and I am not rich enough now to do things that I would like to do since Dick died and the Swan lost its good customers.

SAFETY IN THE MIDST OF DANGER.

This would seem a contradiction—is so, in fact, to the eye. But experience has proved its possibility. Take the case of the individual who dwells in a malarious region. A robust constitution is no certain defence against the dreaded chills. What is? Recorded testimony, covering a period little short of half a century, proves that Hostetter's Stomach Bitters is precisely this. This continent does not limit the field where the medicine has proved its efficacy. In South America, the Isthmus of Panama, Mexico, everywhere in fact where miasma-born disease takes on its most obstinate and formidable types, the Bitters is a recognized specific in illimitable demand, and prescribed by physicians of repute. Potent, too, is it in disorders of the stomach, liver and bowels, and against that destroyer, la grippe. It improves appetite and sleep, neutralizes rheumatism and kidney complaints.

"Sir," exclaimed the orator, "has the Indian any rights?" "He has," said the Chairman, "but he gets left when he tries to assert them."

STITCHES IN THE BACK CURED.

Peter C. Vandewater, Commissioner of Highways, Woodsburgh, Long Island, N. Y., writes:

"During the last three years I have been troubled with stitches in the back. They came on without the slightest warning and laid me up for two and three weeks at a time, and nothing did me any good. Over a year ago I had a more severe attack. I could hardly move. My wife then applied an ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTER on the small of the back where the kink appeared to be. I never had used one before. In a short time all pain had vanished, and the next morning I got up and attended to my business. I put a fresh Plaster on every week for a month and I feel that I have been entirely cured, as I have not had an attack in the last eighteen months."

BEWARE OF OINTMENTS FOR CATARRH THAT CONTAIN MERCURY,

As mercury will surely destroy the sense of smell and completely derange the whole system when entering it through the mucous surfaces. Such articles should never be used except on prescriptions from reputable physicians, as the damage they will do is ten fold to the good you can possibly derive from them. Hall's Catarrh Cure, manufactured by F. J. Cheney & Co., Toledo, O., contains no mercury, and is taken internally, and acts directly upon the blood and mucous surfaces of the system. In buying Hall's Catarrh Cure be sure you get the genuine. It is taken internally, and made in Toledo, Ohio, by F. J. Cheney & Co.

All back—every cent you've paid for it, if it doesn't benefit or cure you. A medicine that promises this is one that promises to help you.

But there's only one medicine of its kind that can and does promise it. It's Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery. It's the guaranteed remedy for all Blood, Skin and Scalp Diseases, from a common blotch or eruption to the worst scrofula. It cleanses, purifies, and enriches the blood, invigorates the system, and cures Salt-rheum, Tetter, Eczema, Erysipelas and all manner of blood-taints from whatever cause. Great Eating Ulcers rapidly heal under its benign influence.

It's the best blood-purifier, and it's the cheapest, no matter how many doses are offered for a dollar—for you pay only for the good you get.

Nothing else is "just as good" as the "Discovery." It may be better—for the dealer. But he wants money and you want help.

OF COURSE SHE IS.

As Peter sat at heaven's gate
A maiden sought permission,
And begged of him, if not too late,
To give her free admission

"What claims hath you to enter here?"
He cried with earnest mein;
"Please, sir," she said, 'twixt hope and fear,
"I'm only just sixteen."

"Enough," the hoary guardian said,
And the gate wide open threw;
"That is the age when every maid
Is girl and angel, too."

JOEL AND JOAN.

Alas for Joel! It was decreed that he should love to distraction the gentle Joan McVey, fairest of Calhoun county's daughters and the pride of Morgan township. That he should love was no misfortune; but that a yawning social gulf should stretch between Joan and himself was a calamity of fate. For Joel, poor lad! "worked around," and had never a foot of land in his own right, while Joan was the heiress of a 800 acre farm, which certainly was worth $50 an acre if it was worth a cent. And, furthermore, Joan's father was the town clerk! "Peter McVey, clerk of Morgan township." What an awful sound it had for Joel, whose vague ideas conceived the office second only to the governor and third beneath the president.

They had spoken but once, yet he could never forget that day, and his mind dwelt upon her honeyed words until life became a desert waste and was given over entirely to the mirage of feverish dreams. She was returning from town in her father's democrat wagon, and Joel was tramping through the sand in the opposite direction. He saw her and his heart thumped his brawny breast like a trip hammer. "She's looking right at me," he muttered with a choking throat, and so she was. He turned to allow the vehicle to pass. Something seemed to whisper to him: "Joel, now or never. Here is your opportunity. Go it, lad!"

"Good evenin', Miss McVey," he stammered, although it was high noon.

"Good morning, Joel," said Joan, with equal disregard for the time of day.

O the sweetness of that voice! "Jest like a meller wind wistlin' through the scrub oaks," sighed Joel rapturously, and he turned to watch her out of sight. Great was his reward, for Joan likewise looked around for another glimpse of the handsome youth. She smiled. His blue "wamus" heaved like a fretful river, and he strained his eyes until she faded into the misty shadows of the woods by Hackett's.

For one whole week Joel was in a seventh heaven; but as time wore on, and his initial success seemed likely to be his last, he fell into the slough of despond. His bashfulness would not allow of his following up the first bold stroke while the iron was hot, and he waited so long to garner sufficient courage that he feared his case was hopeless.

Not having the stamina to bravely address her, what did it devolve upon him to do? He must either give up all thought of her, or—or—why not write? He wrote a fairly good hand, but his spelling was fearful and his composition worse. Here is a letter he began:

miss McVa:

DEER MADIM—This weather is Bad for hayin an i dont care whether I die or stay well im That Rekles I like you an if you like me——

Getting thus far he was in great agony for a word. After wasting his thoughts for ten or fifteen minutes, he showed his good sense by destroying the letter.

The next day he went to town and purchased a work entitled "Lothario's Compendium; or, An Easy Path to Courtship and Marriage. Containing a Complete Set of Letters, from Cold to Madly Impassioned, to Fit Every Variety of Condition. Fully Illustrated."

With this book he returned, and that night, in the solitude of his chamber, with a tallow dip at his elbow, he indited an epistle that did him great credit.

Behold it:

MISS—The boreal fires of my passion are blazing with intensest fervor. My soul is borne on their seething billows to the elysium of ethereal fields, or falls back into a red hot furnace, battling with doubt. Thus ever with alternate hopes and fears my life is gay or sad. I would ask thee, gentle one, if in our brief but heavenly companionship you have learned to care for me—to love me? My life, my happiness, nay, my very soul, hang on your reply. How I remember the first time I ever saw you! It was at the inaugural ball. Your golden hair was dressed in the sweetest of French twists, and you had a bunch of caila lilies at your breast. Oh, how radiant, how bright you were! The president smiled on you, but I fancy your every glance was mine. Was it not so? And do you love me? Or must I, with your denial of my love ringing in my ears, bury my bleak life in heathen lands afar?

Answer me soon, dear one, for this uncertainty is dreadful. Languishingly, JOEL JENNINGS.

In passing, I would say that a portion of this letter did not appear to Joel as quite the proper thing. For instance, he never saw an "inaugural ball" (whatever that might be), and he could not remember that the president had ever smiled on Joan, but he was so afraid of garbling his beautiful copy if he attempted to alter it that he copied it all, put it into a pink envelope, and dropped it in the postoffice with trembling fingers.

Then he waited. Two days, three days, four days passed and still no answer. But Saturday came, and, lo! when Joel made inquiry at the office a fragrant lavender note was handed him. He turned it over and over in his hand. On the face was his name in a beautiful script, and spelled with two capitals—an honor Joel rarely conferred upon himself; on the back was a red seal as large as a silver dollar, with a device of two deers aspectant on the inscription, Si quœris peninsulam amœnam, circumspice.

"How beautiful," thought Joel, as he spelled it out and wondered what in the world it meant.

He could not wait until he got home before reading that letter. He would know his fate at once, and he opened it forthwith:

DEAR JOEL—Long, long have I, with fondest emotions, dwelt upon dreams of you. In my boudoir, many a night, I have watched the light from alabaster lamps scintillating iris hued beams upon the objects de vertu with which my chamber overflows, and, oh! dear one, someway, somehow, each fairy gleam twisted itself into other fairy gleams and contrived to picture your dear face to my love blinded eyes. How hopeless seemed my passion then, how hopeful seems it now. Do I remember the inaugural ball? Ah, me! can I ever forget it? I remember how, leaning upon the arm of the Baron Pounderzo, I swept through a stately minuet, catching your eyes ever and anon—how sweet, how kind, how exquisitely tender! What cared I for president or noble? It was enough for me to know you saw me, and that I was in your thoughts. Sweet fate for humble me! Write me, write me often, dearest. Expectantly,

JOAN MATILDA MCVEY.

Returning to the farm that afternoon Joel seemed to be walking on air, so light were his spirits. He felt that the world was his, and, though he secretly worried over the Baron Pounderzo, he was fain to believe his highness a myth, and of no more substance than the inaugural ball which he had opened in a previous letter.

When he parted the covers of his compendium to find a channel for his gushing heart, he understood Joan's reply, for there it was on page 126, directly following the letter he had written! He and Joan were making love by the same book.

Delightful thought!

Hand to hand they would tread the path the compendium had marked out for them. There would be no inconsistencies, for if Joel, vide Lothario, had whispered burning words to Joan upon the Rhigi Kulm, or had been rowed down the Canalazzo of Venice in her gondola, or had breathed his vows of attachment upon the icy crest of Mont Blanc, Joan had her copy before her and could return him a charming picture of a sunrise from the Rhigi, and the palaces of the Grand Canal, and would, in languishing terms, give him a counter vow from that boudoir with its alabaster lamps, etc.

The next billet doux was entitled "An Outburst of Affection Upon Receipt of the Above," and Joel (innocent youth!) placed this heading, word for word, at the top of his letter—a practice that Joan had hallowed in his mind by following herself. Having dispatched his missive he did not wait for a reply, but immediately turned to his compendium and read it from beginning to end. "How she loves me," he murmured, kissing the dear words, and when at last the letter came, and he compared it with the blessed Lothario's text and found every word, capital and punctuation mark in the proper place, his joy was uncontrolled.

And so, letter by letter, step by step, the loves of Joel and Joan went sweetly and smoothly on until only one note embodying the important declaration and acceptance, as mapped out in the compendium, remained to culminate their courtship; but here a most horrible chasm suddenly confronted the stricken Joel. The leaf with pages 153 and 154, containing the all important declaration, was gone! This declaration (for such Joel esteemed it to be) covered both sides of the sheet and lapped over upon page 155. Several lines remained on that page, but they served only for a kind of polishing off, as it were, of the highly important and delicate matter preceding them. What should Joel do?

He might do several things. First, he could call at Joan's home, procure her compendium and read the letter direct. Second, he could buy another compendium. Third, having gone so far by rote, he could throw Lothario over and go it alone. Fourth, he could——

His timidity would not permit the first. As for the second, not another copy of the compendium was to be had, and he lacked confidence sufficient for the third—but the fourth! That was the thing he would do. He would copy all the declaration that remained and send it in a letter. Joan would think he had neglected to inclose the first portion of it, and, having her book at hand, she could readily supply the deficiency. What a head Joel had! What ingenuity! Certainly he schemed with a skill that merited better success.

Here is the last letter Joel ever wrote to Joan:

and I, proud queen of passion, will harbor my bark in a kinder haven, blown thither by the swelling sails of truer love and fonder devotion.

Adieu. JOEL.

Contrary to all expectation, the days faded into weeks and weeks into months, and all Joel received from Joan was a bundle of his old letters, but no word accompanied them. Poor Joel! What could this neglect mean? Why did not his loved one immediately pen him the words of their patron? Why this chilling silence which so steadily, cruelly, wrapped about his young life and smothered it into despair?

When one year had flown, Joel throttled his forlorn hope, shook the sand of Calhoun county from his feet and sought to sink his sorrow in a lumber camp in the Upper Peninsula. He did not succeed, for, like some forbidding phantom, the unknown cause of Joan's sudden coolness haunted him night and day.

At last fate revealed the reason.

In an idle moment Joel happened upon a book which belonged to a log driver named Saunders—a man whom everybody suspected of French descent. This book was Lothario's Compendium. In feverish haste Joel turned the leaves. Yes! pages 153-4 were there. He read them:

"Answer to the Foregoing, Breaking off All Correspondence and Honorably Renouncing further Intercourse."

MISS ——, I find that you have tampered with my feelings; that, not appreciating the weight of attachment I bore you, you slighted it by receiving attention from others. I can no longer tolerate this wanton sacrifice of my tender passion. My manhood asserts itself, and I hasten to renounce the love that once I truly gave you. I demand a return of all my letters, my diamond ring and my photograph.

To you I will ever be a brother; more I cannot be, for I have found another who truly loves me and whom, though I do not love as yet, I will in time set up in my heart in the place so recently held by yourself. You go your way with the gallants who have replaced me in your breast.

Here followed the words which Joel had written:

And I, proud queen of passion, will harbor my bark in a kinder haven, blown thither by the swelling sails of truer love and fonder devotion. Adieu.

Joel sighed wearily; then, looking about the shanty to see that he was unobserved, he threw Lothario's Compendium into the fire and watched it burn with grim satisfaction.—William Wallace Cook in Free Press.

Borax Baths Aid the Complexion.

Hot baths, with plenty of pearline in the water and friction afterward, get up a healthy action of the skin, which leaves the face fair and opal tinted hours afterward. One of the most beautiful complexions I know is kept by this practice, joined to care in eating. Pearline, you know, is borax and vegetable oil, with a little bleaching agent, I fancy, and its effect is to eat off the outer coating of the skin, while the alkali stimulates the capillaries by its irritation. The eyes will be dark and bright after such a bath, but if you want to insure their brilliancy a pharmacist who studies these things says one must eat freely of tomatoes for the sake of the atropine or its kindred quality they contain. Certainly wholesome tomatoes keep skin and eyes in good condition as far as food can do it.—Shirley Dare in New York Herald.

Mutton Hash.

An excellent hash may be made by chopping the mutton fine, removing all gristle and fat, mix it with two-thirds dry bread crumbs, season with pepper, salt, an onion minced, a little parsley or celery top, moistened with the gravy left from the roast or with stock, fried brown and served hot; or the minced mutton may be mixed with potatoes, rice or bread crumbs, molded into croquettes or flat cakes, fried brown and served with tomato sauce. Be sure, however, to moisten with gravy or stock, and to remove every particle of fat. —Good Housekeeping.

Austria pensions ballet girls of the Vienna opera. Before they secure a pension, however, they must be pronounced by examiners as neither young enough, beautiful enough nor graceful enough to take even the most insignificant part.

COLORS TO WEAR.

Hints on the Selection of Correct Tints.

SHADES TO SUIT THE COMPLEXION.

"No Woman is Ugly When Well Dressed." Blending Colors.

"No woman is ugly when she is dressed." Only Lord Chesterfield could have been guilty of such a gallant perversion of the truth.

If he used the word "dressed" advisedly and meant clothed with a due regard to the selection of becoming colors and to the cut and style of the gown to suit the individuality of the wearer he was undoubtedly right—no woman is ugly who is artistically and becomingly dressed. But so few women seem to to know what colors will enhance or destroy their good looks, what style of gown will conceal their defects and heighten their charms and what way of arranging their hair will improve their faces, that dress ofttimes instead of adding beauty to the appearance has the contrary effect.

People who are florid must be careful what reds they use even more than pale people. A deep blue red—that red suggested in a plum or the velvet leaf of a red pansy that has caught a shade from the petals of its near neighbor, the dark blue pansy—is the color for florid complexions. Grown people should be careful not to wear bright red. As Modjeska observes, "As one grows older red is more becoming above the face than below it." Dark cardinal velvet above gray hair and dark eyes has a most charming effect.

Pink is most becoming for fair, young people. Rose color, combined with black, white or gray, can be worn with impunity by the youthful and fair.

Magenta should be suppressed. Only a dazzlingly beauteous being could survive the uglifying effect of this depraved color, and then it must be combined with white.

Dark sage green is an almost universally becoming color. It annuls any tinge of green there may be in the complexion; for this reason brunette people generally look well in green.

Only those who have an exquisite complexion should dare to wear pale green. If the complexions are clear, rosy, fair and dark have equal privileges.

Yellow is a delicious color—a favorite hue of the old masters and old Dame Nature. Warm yellow has a good effect on the complexion. It makes the skin look fairer than it really is. It goes pleasingly with many colors. A brunette will look particularly handsome in a green yellow. Mustard color, which is insufferable by daylight, is simply delicious in the gaslight. Pure blue and yellow is harsh. A good rule is never to combine two colors of equal intensity. One of two colors should be dull and not too pure.

Yellow will blend well with old gobelin blue, with heliotrope and certain shades of blue grays. Amber of all shades is exceedingly becoming to dark people.

People with blue eyes should not wear bright blue. It makes their eyes look faded and detracts from the bloom of the complexion.

Black should be worn advisedly by both old and young. The young can wear it better than the old. It brings out clearly the hard lines in the face, and seems to deaden the bloom of the skin. Golden haired blondes, red haired maids and matrons and dark people with clear, rosy complexions can wear black and look well. All others can modify its hardening effects by combining white, red, orange, gray or yellow with it.

All but people with very coarse complexions look exceedingly well in white.

Every color can be made becoming by being artistically arranged and relieved by another color, or by the soft, subduing effects of net or lace or airy tulle. —New York Herald.

A Refreshing Bath.

A warm salt bath is very refreshing to any one suffering from exhaustion of travel or of a long shopping expedition, which is as trying to mind and body as anything which can be undertaken by a woman. Away from the seashore a very simple substitute for sea water is a cup of rock salt dissolved in warm water and added to the bath. When the salt is irritating to the skin, take a warm bath and sponge off with a mixture of violet or lavender water and alcohol, about half and half, and rub briskly with the warm friction towel. Such a method prevents the exhaustion and danger of cold which follows a warm bath.—Herald of Health.

Two Ways of Riding.

The Princess of Wales is responsible for the right and left positions in the saddle now obligatory to every equestrienne. Owing to a chronic lameness in her right limb she is forced to use a left side saddle. To make the fact less conspicuous the princesses have been trained to ride in both right and left saddle seats. A few horsewomen in New York while abroad caught the idea and have since introduced the fashion of two saddles. There is in consequence great rejoicing among the saddlers and riding teachers.—New York Letter.

A Female Inventor.

Miss Jessie McIntosh, daughter of Judge McQueen McIntosh, of Georgia, about two years ago invented an apparatus for the preservation of fruit during transportation by rail. She sold the patent for a handsome sum, which, by judicious investment, has almost trebled itself within the two years. It is said that Miss McIntosh, who has a great talent for mechanics, has just perfected another invention more remarkable than her first, but its nature is as yet a secret. —Exchange.

A Young Actress' Debt to Florence.

One instance out of a hundred shows how quick Actor W. J. Florence was to see talent and to infuse his own spirit. He was playing some years ago in the west, and one of the characters was portrayed by a quite young girl, a member of the company. She was taken ill suddenly and there was no one to fill her place. A little maiden in the town who had recited quite effectively in Sunday school affairs was sent for, and Mr. Florence himself coached her in her part. When evening came he encouraged her so that she went through the task not only without a break, but very creditably. At the close of the performance Mr. Florence led her forward and made a neat little speech, ending: "It was my idea before the play that this little girl might possibly by study become an actress, but I am now satisfied that nature has already made her one. Yes, this little girl is a born actress, whom the world will hear from later."

The child's mother was a widow and poor, and from that day on the mother received money regularly from Mr. Florence to educate the girl, who is now eighteen, and already making a name for herself. She has never seen Mr. Florence since, and her ambition was not to see him until the day when she could feel that she had deserved his kindness and cancel the money obligation, which he probably had forgotten long before he died.

Science Applied to Agriculture.

A writer who believes in the department of agriculture and in the value of improved methods of farming says:

"A fine example of what science has done for agriculture is found in the matter of resting the soil by rotation of crops. It took the world a long time to find out that a change of crop, when properly made, rests the soil as well as fallowing; a long time to learn that an increase of live stock on a farm, under certain conditions, increases its fertility; a long time to learn that artificial drainage warms and lightens cold and heavy soils, advancing the harvest by weeks and bringing the subsoil to the support of the impoverished surface, by which, as some one has said, we find a new farm under the old, or as Emerson graphically put it, 'By drainage we have gone to the subsoil, and we have a Concord under Concord, a Middlesex under Middlesex and a basement story of Massachusetts more valuable than the superstructure.' These things were not learned by accident, but were demonstrated by the application of scientific principles."

Forced from Home by Taxation.

Heavy taxation is cutting down the population of Afghanistan like a pestilence, the only difference being that the people instead of dying have fled to other countries. The decrease since the last census in the district of Candahar alone is 10,000 souls. Many of the fugitives have gone to British India and Beloochistan. In the northern part of the country the exodus has been still greater, the people emigrating to the Russian possessions. In Tashkurgan, for instance, where, when the present ameer ascended the throne, there were 16,000 occupied houses, there are now only 6,000 houses with tenants. The ameer's country used to be called the land of men and stones, but an Indian journal suggests that if the present flight continues it will become a land of stones alone.

A Widely Prevalent Disease.

In connection with the current announcement that the grip is to make its annual tour through the United States this winter it may be of interest to note that the disease spends what with us is the warm season in other lands. It has been particularly severe in Australia during the last few months, the winter season in that quarter of the globe, where the middle of July is the chilliest time of the year. The governor of Victoria was confined to his bed for several days, and many of his engagements for a considerable period had to be canceled. The postmaster general, the chief secretary and minister of lands, and many other members of the government were prostrated, and serious inconvenience was caused generally in the conduct of public and private business.

Refused a Testimonial.

Fire Marshal D. J. Swenie, of Chicago, has set the example of refusing presents while in office. Carter Harrison and others started in to "surprise" him, and he surprised them very thoroughly. The arrangement was to get up a beautiful medallion containing a life size photograph of the chief surrounded by small photographs of his subordinates. All this was to be handsomely mounted and presented with a glowing speech by Mr. Harrison.

D. J. SWENIE.

On the face of it this would seem to be a present from a few gentlemen outside, but it soon transpired that all the subordinates of the fire department were called on to contribute according to their rank. Chief Swenie heard of it and came down on the scheme flat footed. He called attention to a rule the others had overlooked forbidding any official to solicit contributions of those under him or accept any testimonial. "There is," says the chief, "only one time when I approve of testimonials, and that is when an official is retiring. Then if he deserves it the testimonial is proper."

Value of the Pig's Tail.

The pig's tail has obtained a certain prominence in that it has been made a subject for argument by farmers on the Pacific coast. Some claim that it is useless, while others assert that it indicates the exact physical condition of the animal. If it hang loose, it indicates that the pig is not in condition and that its feed should be changed. If it be coiled tightly, it indicates contentment and good health.

A Copy of the Marble Faun.

There recently arrived at Bowdoin college the long expected statue of the Marble Faun, the original of which by Praxiteles is in the Capitoline museum at Rome. The cast is a present to the college from the class of 1881. A previous cast, made under the supervision of Franklin Simmons, the Maine sculptor, was broken on the way over last year, but the one just received is perfect.

Liberal to the Newly Wedded.

Apparently Sulphur Springs, Tex., is a good place in which to woo and wed. Whenever young people get married there the residents club together and buy them nearly all their household furniture. The gifts range in aggregate value from $100 to $1,000, according to the popularity of the beneficiaries.

TO DEFEND THE COASTS.

A Task Devolving Upon the Engineering Department.

PLANS READY, ONLY MONEY IS NEEDED.

Fortifying our Harbors and Seaports.—Gen. Abbot's Career.

The recent diplomatic complications with Italy and the present attitude of Chili have directed the attention of the American people to the question of efficient seacoast defense.

The war department realized ten years back that the establishment of a strong coast and harbor defense would be an ample guarantee of peace, and consequently ordered a thorough investigation as to the best means by which American seaports could be thoroughly protected.

Some time has passed since plans were prepared for the fortification of New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Hampton Roads, Washington, New Orleans, San Francisco and other cities, but lack of money has hitherto prevented the engineering department from prosecuting the work of construction. The gigantic task that sooner or later must be accomplished is only in an elementary stage. At the rate at which it is now carried on it will take at least fifteen years before anything like an efficient coast and harbor system of defense can be completed. There is, however, every hope that the next congress will be liberal in its appropriations for this purpose.

The engineering department is now constructing fortifications, mortar, dynamite gun and disappearing batteries at New York, Boston, Baltimore and San Francisco, while other cities are to receive their share of modern coast rifles, for which contracts amounting to about $3,000,000 have been recently placed. The mortar batteries consist of several guns each, which are hidden behind heavy earth works at points along the shore where they can command a long seaward range.

A shell from one of these iron monsters weighs 628 pounds and will travel five miles with an initial velocity of 1,500 feet per second and pierce easily the protective steel deck of an ironclad. The shell loaded with powder and exploding on a vessel's deck will cause great destruction of life. The disappearing batteries consist of only one heavy gun each, which throws a shell of 1,050 pounds. The effective range of this gun is about twelve miles, and as after each shot the gun disappears it is impossible for the enemy to disable it.

GENERAL HENRY LARCOM ABBOT.

The new plans for coast and harbor defense are highly creditable to the capability and ingenuity of the engineer corps. Among the most prominent officers of this corps is General Henry Larcom Abbot, the director of the board of fortifications and engineers. This eminent officer and war scientist is known far beyond the borders of the United States as one of the best authorities in the art of modern military engineering. It is with a feeling of pride that the writer pays tribute to so distinguished a soldier. Most of the new plans are of General Abbot's creation, and they all reflect his genius and practical skill. Apart from his success in this direction he has worked hard to develop the general art of military engineering in America, and the existence of the engineer school of application at Willet's Point is due to his efforts.

General Abbot was born in Beverly, Mass., Aug. 13, 1831. He was graduated at West Point in 1854, and then became brevet second lieutenant of topographical engineers. He was subsequently employed in the office of the Pacific railroad surveys at Washington. One year afterward he was transferred to the survey of the route between California and Oregon. It was not, however, until the civil war that Abbot's capabilities were fully appreciated. He was then engaged as a military engineer and took part in various actions, being seriously wounded at Bull Run. After the war he was brevetted brigadier general United States army, and in 1880 he was made lieutenant colonel of engineers.

For a quarter of a century he has studied the coast and harbor defenses of America, and on the subject of high explosives he is regarded as an authority in Europe as well as in the United States.

He has also invented and developed a system of submarine mines for coast and harbor defense, and has held positions as a member of the engineer board on United States military bridge equipage and drill and on the board for the protection of the alluvial region of the Mississippi against inundations. He has likewise been connected with nearly every board on fortifications and river and harbor improvements. At present he is director of engineers and the board of fortifications.

The United States government sent him in 1870 to Sicily to observe the solar eclipse which took place during that year, and his work there, as elsewhere, was performed with complete satisfaction. Among his most noted literary productions the following deserve special mention: "Physics and Hydraulics of the Mississippi," which he jointly published in 1861 with Captain A. A. Humphreys; "Siege Artillery in the Campaign Against Richmond;" "United States Bridge Equipage and Drill," 1870; "Experiments and Investigations to Develop a System of Submarine Mines for Harbors of the United States," 1881; "Report of Gun Foundry," 1884, and "Report of the Board on Fortifications or Other Defenses," 1886.

General Abbot is now sixty years old. He is a man of medium height, with iron gray hair and a full beard. His large gray eyes are very expressive and glow with intelligence and affability. The high forehead reveals the thinker. He is greatly esteemed by his superiors and beloved by the officers of his corps.

LIEUT. F. DE THUMMEL CLOTH.

The provisions for the future maintenance of public schools in the partially settled northwest provinces of Canada are on a large scale. Saskatchewan has set apart 3,648,000 acres of land for that purpose, Assiniboia 3,040,000 acres and Alberta 3,200,000

KING OF THE FORGERS.

He Wrote His Way Into Prison and Then Wrote His Way Out.

The star forger of the age is undoubtedly Edward L. Stoddard, who is now in custody at Jersey City. Mr. Stoddard's most recent trouble originated in the fact that he telegraphed to the National bank, of Pittsfield, Mass., for sixty dollars, and signed the name of John S. Wolfe, a depositor, to the dispatch. The police gathered him in, and while he was at the jail awaiting examination he sent the following letter to Miss Belle Duncan, of Brookfield, Mass., under the belief that her brother Charles was absent from home and that he could take advantage of his knowledge of the young man's handwriting:

E. L. STODDARD.

DEAR SISTER—Am under arrest for forgery. Was arrested last Wednesday. Have mother send me by express $800 to save me from prison. This sum will be necessary. Don't permit her to refuse. I am here under the name of John S. Wolfe. Let it come at once, as my final hearing is for Saturday morning. I have tried to protect our family name, and have therefore given a fictitious one. I am awfully worried and almost crazed with grief. If you cannot send the money from Brookfield, go to Worcester and send it from there. Give my love to our mother, and save me from prison. Don't one of you write me a word, as the authorities here would find out my name and who my people are. My dear sister, see that this money is forwarded at once. I was on here buying some horses from a railroad company when I was suddenly and wrongfully accused. Have money, but cannot get at it while here. I have not heard of Winfield. I have suffered fearfully and am suffering still. Send money to John S. Wolfe, Direct in care of Chief of Police Murphy. Forgive me, dear Belle, for causing all this grief. Your loving brother, CHARLES.

The genuine Charles chanced to be in the house when this precious epistle arrived, so instead of "making a raise" Stoddard got farther into trouble than before. When Chief Murphy heard from the Duncans he concluded to investigate. So he sent Stoddard's photograph to the police of all large American cities and soon learned that the governor of Tennessee was very anxious indeed to get the prisoner within his jurisdiction. The fellow, under the alias of Henry B. Davis, had been sentenced to the penitentiary of that state for passing bogus checks.

He had hardly donned his striped suit when Governor Buchanan received a bulky package by mail. It contained a letter from Lawyer Baptist, who had been Davis' counsel at the trial, and a petition signed by many prominent citizens, including the judge, jury and state's attorney who had helped to send the man to prison. The documents asserted the convict's innocence so strongly that the governor pardoned him forthwith, only to learn a few weeks afterward that Stoddard had forged the papers.

Naturally he wants to put the rascal back in the place from which he released him and has sent on a requisition. Massachusetts and Georgia are also clamoring for Stoddard's services, but Governor Abbett has decided that he must first take a dose of Jersey justice.

Rescued from a Paris Sewer.

Every one who has read "Charles O'Malley" will recall the trick played by the student Weber, who persuaded the people that an escaped prisoner was in the sewer and induced them to tear up the street to effect his rescue. Unwittingly a resident of a Paris suburb caused a nearly equal hubbub the other day. While passing along the Rue Doudeauville, Montmartre, he heard cries sounding like a repetition of the word "maman" or "mamma." He traced them to an open manhole near by and raised an alarm. Five hundred persons soon assembled round the spot, and various theories were enunciated. Some of the bystanders were of the opinion that a man had thrown a child into the sewer. Others believed that one of the sewer men had been taken ill and was calling for assistance. At length it struck one person in the crowd, who had more common sense than his fellows, that if there had been an accident of any sort much valuable time was being lost, and he accordingly rushed off to the nearest fire signal and summoned the sapeurs pompiers, that valuable body of men for whom the Parisians always send when there is anything they cannot understand. In five minutes a detachment of the gallant fellows came running up with their machine, and, on being informed of the cause of the emotion, they disappeared down the manhole into the sewer. In a very short time they were back again in the street, one of them holding in his arms a large specimen of the harmless, necessary cat, which was suffering from a broken leg.

Built Fires for Fun.

For a long time the people of Brooklyn have been worried over the frequency of fires indisputably of incendiary origin, and the police have searched everywhere for the fiend who has so often endangered life and destroyed property. Now they think they have him in the person of a young man named John McGowan. Late one night recently William Tracy, who lives with his wife and three children on the second floor of 2 Phillips alley, was awakened by a noise in the hall below. On opening his door and seeing the stairway full of smoke he ran down to the street, where he met and seized a young man who was looking at the fire. In reply to Tracy's questions he said he was a watchman who had been attracted by the blaze. He disappeared while Tracy was putting out the flames.

JOHN M'GOWAN.

An hour later a sailor named Dennis O'Connor saw a man kindle a fire at the door of a stable. He stamped out the burning brands and then called a policeman. The firebug, who had run away when he saw the sailor, was found by the policeman in an alley in the rear of the stable. He was taken to the Fulton street station, where he gave his name as John McGowan, and said he was twenty-one years old. He said he lived at 214 York street, but the police say he has no home.

McGowan denied that he had set fire to the tenement or the stable, but when he was confronted with Tracy, who positively identified him as the man he saw in the hallway, he broke down and made a full confession. He told Detectives Kearney and Noonan that he started the fire in the tenement just for fun, and that he intended to put it out as soon as he had given the people in the house a good scare.

STUDYING HIS DISEASES.

Disastrous Effect of Reading Medical Works.

A WRITER'S HORRIFYING DISCOVERIES.

He had all the Ills Flesh was Heir to.—The Cure Therefor.

It is a most extraordinary thing, but I never read a patent medicine advertisement without being impelled to the conclusion that I am suffering from the particular disease therein dealth with in its most virulent form. The diagnosis seems in every case to correspond exactly with all the sensations that I have ever felt.

I remember going to the British museum one day to read up the treatment for some slight ailment of which I had a touch—hay fever I fancy it was. I got down the book, and read all I came to read; and then, in an unthinking moment, I idly turned the leaves, and began to indolently study diseases generally. I forgot which was the first distemper I plunged into—some fearful, devastating scourge, I know—and, before I had glanced half down the list of premonitory symptoms, it was borne in upon me that I had fairly got it.

I sat for a while, frozen with horror; and then, in the listlessness of despair, I again turned over the pages. I came to typhoid fever—read the symptoms—discovered that I had typhoid fever, must have had it for months without knowing it—wondered what else I had got; turned up St. Vitus' dance—found, as I expected, that I had that, too—began to get interested in my case, and determined to sift it to the bottom, and so started alphabetically—read up ague, and learned that I was sickening for it, and that the acute stage would commence in about another fortnight. Bright's disease, I was relieved to find, I had only in a modified form, and, so far as that was concerned, I might live for years. Cholera I had, with severe complications; and diphtheria I seemed to have been born with. I plodded conscientiously through the twenty-six letters, and the only malady I could conclude I had not got was housemaid's knee.

I felt rather hurt about this at first; it seemed somehow to be a sort of slight. Why hadn't I got housemaid's knee? Why this invidious reservation? After a while, however, less grasping feelings prevailed. I reflected that I had every other known malady in the pharmacology, and I grew less selfish, and determined to do without housemaid's knee. Gout, in its most malignant stage, it would appear, had seized me without my being aware of it; and zymosis I had evidently been suffering with from boyhood. There were no more diseases after zymosis, so I concluded there was nothing else the matter with me.

I sat and pondered. I thought what an interesting case I must be from a medical point of view, what an acquisition I should be to a class! Students would have no need to "walk the hospitals" if they had me. I was a hospital in myself. All they need do would be to walk round me, and, after that, take their diploma.

Then I wondered how long I had to live. I tried to examine myself. I felt my pulse. I could not at first feel any pulse at all. Then all of a sudden it seemed to start off. I pulled out my watch and timed it. I made it a hundred and forty-seven to the minute. I tried to feel my heart. I could not feel my heart. It had stopped beating. I have since been induced to come to the opinion that it must have been there all the time, and must have been beating, but I cannot account for it. I patted myself all over my front, from what I call my waist up to my head, and I went a bit round each side, and a little way up the back. But I could not feel or hear anything. I tried to look at my tongue. I stuck it out as far as ever it would go, and I shut one eye, and tried to examine it with the other. I could only see the tip, and the only thing that I could gain from that was to feel more certain than before that I had scarlet fever.

I had walked into that reading room a happy, healthy man. I crawled out a decrepit wreck.

I went to my medical man. He is an old chum of mine, and feels my pulse, and looks at my tongue, and talks about the weather, all for nothing, when I fancy I'm ill; so I thought I would do him a good turn by going to him now. "What a doctor wants," I said, "is practice. He shall have me. He will get more practice out of me than out of seventeen hundred of your ordinary, commonplace patients, with only one or two diseases each." So I went straight up and saw him, and he said:

"Well, what's the matter with you?"

I said:

"I will not take up your time, dear boy, with telling you what is the matter with me. Life is brief, and you might pass away before I had finished. But I will tell you what is not the matter with me. I have not got housemaid's knee. Why I have not got housemaid's knee I cannot tell you; but the fact remains that I have not got it. Everything else, however, I have got it."

And I told him how I came to discover it all.

Then he opened me and looked down me, and clutched hold of my wrist, and then he hit me over the chest when I wasn't expecting it—a cowardly thing to do, I call it—and immediately afterward butted me with the side of his head. After that he sat down and wrote out a prescription, and folded it up and gave it me, and I put it in my pocket and went out.

I did not open it. I took it to the nearest chemist's and handed it in. The man read it and then handed it back.

He said he didn't keep it.

I said:

"You are a chemist?"

He said:

"I am a chemist. If I was a co-operative store and family hotel combined I might be able to oblige you. Being only a chemist hampers me."

I read the prescription. It ran:

1 lb. beefsteak, with 1 pt. bitter beer
every 6 hours.
1 ten mile walk every morning.
1 bed at 11 sharp every night.

And don't stuff up your head with things you don't understand.

I followed the directions with the happy result—speaking for myself—that my life was preserved and is still going on.—Lawrence K. Jerome's Three Men in a Boat.

Dr. A. E. Macdonald, the general superintendent of New York city's lunatic asylums, has demonstrated by statistics that it is not true that insanity is increasing in a higher ratio than the increase of population. The number of pauper lunatics in the institutions under his charge at this time is 5,355. Dr. Macdonald says that it is pleasant for him to be able to refute a notion that has become popular on this subject, but which is not sustained by the facts in his possession.

INYO INDEPENDENT.

Irv. H. Mulholland,
EDITOR & PROPRIETOR.
PUBLISHED EVERY FRIDAY

INDEPENDENCE, CAL.
FRIDAY, MAY 13 1892

It is fortunate for the country that a great majority of the Republican party have always been too intelligent and too independent to be blindly led. The last general election, when so many Republicans were driven out of Congress, ought to have taught professional politicians that rascality is sure to provoke rebellion. But it would appear that in our own State the lesson has been lost. The Stockton convention is but cumulative proof that the machinery of the party is in the hands of as vile a set of boodlers as ever existed outside of a penitentiary. On the floor of the convention a delegate from San Francisco declared that at one of the precincts there he saw a long line of men going to the poll to vote for delegates and it would have been contamination for a decent man to stand among them. Many of them had been in San Quentin and other prisons. There were burglars, pickpockets, footpads, fellows who were supported by fallen women, gamblers and all sorts of rascals and villains among them. This delegate strongly objected to the admission of delegates elected by such means. Another delegate said that the whole election for delegates in San Francisco had been so corrupt and vile that if an inquiry were gone into of the right of any delegate to a seat in the convention, such a mass of rottenness and corruption would be revealed to the public as would cover the party with shame and confusion, and in order to escape this it was decided to admit all without further question. If such terrible accusations should come from political opponents it might be set down as political mud throwing; but coming from respectable delegates, and made openly on the floor of the convention, no denial or excuse will be of avail. The platform adopted by the convention was prepared by a railroad attorney. There is not one word in it in condemnation of the wholesale corruption that prevailed in the last Legislature, nor of the equally extensive frauds exposed in the San Francisco Custom House. The framers of the platform are in the boodle ring, and they are not likely to condemn the means by which they live and get rich. At least nine-tenths of the Republicans of the State, and probably a much larger proportion, want free coinage of silver. The reference to silver is enough to make the gloomy vault of Hades echo with the laughter of devils. "We are in favor of the free coinage of silver—as soon as it can be done without injury to the interests of the country!" Why, Caliban, even, when worshiping the drunken sot, Trinculo, as a god, would have intelligence enough not to be fooled by such rot as this. Every man of ordinary intelligence knows well that "the interests of the country" are injured every day and every hour by the want of free coinage, and every man but a rascal openly declares that to be his belief. But the money power rules the machinery of the party, hence the juggle on silver.

It was a funny incident where Morris March Estee figured. Ten years ago Morris made a wrong guess which way the cat would jump and opposed the railroad. Poor Morris seems to have a congenital craving for some or any kind of office. He soon discovered his mistake and humbly begged pardon. Through all the years since he has been laboring to secure forgiveness, but in vain. He wanted to go as a delegate to Minneapolis and by a mistake was elected. But the moment the mistake was discovered another count was ordered by the railroad power, and poor Morris was knocked out. There could not be plainer evidence than this how completely the machinery of the party is controlled by the great corporations. Of the four delegates at large chosen by the convention every man is a millionaire. The line is sharply drawn. It is the rich on one side, the poor on the other. Every scoundrel who is ready to sell his own soul to Beliol and help enslave his fellow men, will hasten to defend or excuse the action of this convention. The great party of Lincoln could not escape the last depth of degredation. The attorney of Mike De Young shouted a threat on the floor of the convention, that if his employer was not elected a delegate at large he would disrupt the party in the State and defeat the coming election. Mike was elected. After that the descent into hell is easy. (This might have sounded less unpleasant in Latin.) The old saw about one man taking a horse to water but twenty not able to make him drink is well enough understood. It will be seen if the filthy pool that was prepared at Stockton will be deemed good enough to drink from next November.

How Witches Were Convicted.

One of the theories of the age was that the devil set his mark upon each of his servants—that witches were all marked. A jury of the sex of the accused was appointed to examine the body for such marks. It often happened that some excrescence of flesh common to old people, or one explainable by natural causes, was found. One such was found on the body of Goody Nurse and reported to the court, all but one of the jury agreeing to the report. Rebecca Preston and Mary Tarbell knew that the mark was from natural causes. The prisoner stated to the court that the dissenting woman of the jury of examination was one of the most ancient, skillful and prudent, and further declared, "I there rendered a sufficient known reason of the moving cause thereof." She asked for the appointment of another jury to inquire into the case and examine the marks found on her person.

The jury of trials returned a verdict of not guilty. Thereupon all the accusers in court "cried out" with renewed vigor and were taken in the most violent fits, rolling and tumbling about, creating a scene of the wildest confusion. The judges told the jurymen that they had not carefully considered one expression of the prisoner, namely, that when one Hobbs, a confessing witch, was brought in as evidence against her she said: "What, do you bring her? She is one of us." The jury retired for further consultation. Even then they could not agree upon a verdict of guilty. They returned to the courtroom and desired that the accused explain the remark. She made no response, and the jury returned a verdict of guilty.—New England Magazine.

Barbarian Bee Communities.

The so called queen bee is really the mother of the hive. Her functions are maternal rather than regal. If she may be said to reign in a certain sense, the workers rule, deciding all questions and performing all acts affecting the common weal. Populous and powerful bee communities sometimes relapse into barbarism, renounce the life of peaceful industry for which they have become proverbial, acquire predatory habits and roam about the country as freebooters, plundering the smaller and weaker hives and subsisting on the spoils.

These brigand bees seldom reform; if they busily "improve each shining hour" it is not to "gather honey all the day from every opening flower," but to range the fields in looting parties and ransack the homes of honest honey makers. Against these maranders of apian society and other foes the honey bees often fortify their hives, barricading the entrance by a thick wall, with bastions, casemates and deep, narrow gateways. When there seems to be no immediate danger of hostile attack these defensive works, which seriously interfere with the ordinary industrial life of the hive, are removed and not rebuilt until there is fresh occasion for alarm. —Atlantic Monthly.

A Departure in Telephony.

The manager of the telephone exchange in Lisbon achieved distinction some time since by connecting the royal palace with the opera house at a time when the king was in mourning. The telephone man also connected his own house with the transmitters on the stage of the opera, and had wires with receivers attached all around his drawing room. On opera nights he used to invite his friends to enjoy the performance at his house, and it was a curious sight when some ten or twelve people were sitting about the room in comfortable armchairs with receivers to their ears—head telephones were used, so that there was no necessity of holding up one's hands all the time—and listening attentively without uttering a sound beyond an occasional exclamation of delight or surprise.—Electricity.

Songs Not Easy.

Beranger, the famous French poet, whose greatest gift lay in writing little poems which he called songs, was particularly dependent upon the chance visits of the muse.

He was once visited by the author and academician, Viennet, who said to him:

"You must have written several songs since I saw you last."

"I have only begun one," answered Beranger.

"Only one! I am astonished!" exclaimed Viennet.

Beranger became indignant.

"Humph!" he shouted. "Do you think one can turn off a song as one turns off a tragedy?"—Youth's Companion.

Use of the Telephone in Surgery.

A remarkable application has been made by Dr. J. Mount Bleyer. In a case of membranous croup intubation was successfully resorted to. When the removal of the tube became necessary it had disappeared. Tracheotomy would evidently have to be performed, but the difficulty was to locate the tube. A delicate metallic probe attached to an electric wire, the other end of which terminated in a telephone receiver, was passed down through the larynx. As soon as it came in contact with the tube a distinct click was communicated to the ear through the receiver. The exact location having thus been determined, tracheotomy was performed and the tube extracted.—New York Telegram.

English Oaks.

The old "Parliamentary Oak," in Clipstone park, England, is believed to be 1,500 years old. The tallest oak in that country, called the "Duke's Walking Stick," is higher than the spire of Westminster abbey, and the largest is the "Cowthorpie," which now measures seventy-eight feet in circumference, and at one time with its branches covered more than an acre of space.—Philadelphia Ledger.

Chinese Built Bridges in 65.

From an early date the Chinese seem to have constructed suspension bridges of considerable magnitude, one in the province of Junnan, constructed in the year 65 A. D., being the most celebrated. —New York Journal.

How to Tell Fresh Cod.

To tell a good cod when you go to market, examine the fish just above the tail. In a healthy cod the body is round and plump. The lower half of the fish will be almost cone shaped.—New York Journal.

Agricultural chemists estimate the nutriment of 100 pounds of cotton seed meal as equal to 318 pounds of corn or to 767 pounds of wheat bran.

THE LAST DECADE.

When murky clouds that pall a summer day
Do, ere its close, dissolve and drift away,
What joyous smiles break o'er the sunlit plain,
How stirs the dormant pulse of life again!
And in the afterglow of fading light
There breathes a promise of a morrow bright;
So at this century's eventide—whose years
Vain hopes have wrought to merge in darkening fears—
Doth man rejoice; for from a rifted west
Assuring rays beam across his weary quest,
Dull, leaden skies now change to gladdening hues;
The waiting heart its cherished song renews;
That song divine!—not less its power than when
'Twas first heard—"Peace on earth, good will to men."

—Gilbert S. Fletcher in New Nation.

Music, Welsh and Basque.

Having two American friends stopping with us, we brought a nice Welsh girl from Dolgelly one evening to sing to them the national songs. Miss Madge Roberts, a sweet, pretty young lady and excellent singer, went over an immense repertory of Welsh music, and Miss S., who is a very scientific musician, made many remarks on the peculiarities of the Welsh scale, etc. Suddenly she exclaimed: "I cannot think what music it is that I know that these Welsh tunes so much resemble. Stay, it is Basque!" and she proceeded to hum three or four typical Basque songs. Miss Roberts and all of us instantly recognized the similarity of these with the Welsh, especially the oldest Welsh, songs which she had been singing.

Miss S. was very much surprised when I told her that Professor Boyd Dawkins believed in the original identity of the Basque and pre-Celtic Welsh, a theory of which she was quite ignorant, so that her testimony to the similarity of the national music was entirely spontaneous.

I am not musical, and my opinion is of no value, but there does appear to me to be in the old Welsh music, as in a great deal of the Welsh character, a distinctly non-Aryan spritelike character, irreducible to the order so dear to the Saxon soul. The music goes on for a few bars with even, exaggerated emphasis on time as in a soldier's march; then suddenly, as if tired of it, bounds off among the bushes, hop, skip and jump and never comes back!—London Academy.

Stopped the Miracles.

The tomb of Saint Etienne de Muret, canonized in 1088, in the Abbey of Grandmond, was so great an offender on account of the number of miracles that the religious were completely worn out by the rush of votaries. The prior devised, however, a very simple but effective remedy for this grievance. Betaking himself to the tomb, he spake as follows: "Servant of God, you preached to us the delights of solitude and yet you assemble in our retreat as many people as if it were a market or a fair. We are sufficiently persuaded of your sanctity not to be curious about your miracles. If, then, you will not leave off working them, we protest and declare on high, in virtue of the obedience we have promised you, that we will unearth your bones and throw them into the river." As might be expected, the threat was sufficient, and Saint Etienne de Muret did no more miracles.—All the Year Round.

A Useful Patrol Wagon.

A useful patrol wagon has been devised for electric railroaders. It is constructed very much like a police wagon, but has a square tower rising out of it which is mounted by a ladder. The tower is raised or lowered by means of a crank and pulley, and when elevated to its full extent it is fifteen feet high. The consequence is that the lineman can drive under the wire to be repaired and be immediately placed by the raising of the tower on a level with his work. The patrol wagon is a great improvement on the old method of repairing, without its risks.—Exchange.

Shakespeare's Autograph Worth $100,000

"The most valuable autograph in the world is that of Shakespeare," said a dealer. "There are only three genuine autographs of Shakespeare in existence, and those are altogether out of the market. Bring me a genuine Shakespeare and I'll undertake to pay you $50,000, yes, $100,000, for it within a year. It might not sell immediately for a very large sum, but it would be sure to do so as soon as collectors were satisfied as to its genuineness and became properly excited about it."—Collector.

A Liberal Offer.

Seventeen years ago a young man in Chicago found a pocketbook containing several thousand dollars. Now, having made nearly a million dollars clear from this find, he advertises for the loser and expresses his "willingness to pay for the pocketbook and restore the amount of the contents."—Philadelphia Ledger.

An Innocent Rural Lady.

Monroe is a flag station on the Botsford branch of the New Haven and Derby road. When the engineer of Conductor Beer's train saw the flag exposed a day or two ago he stopped his train. Only one person, an old lady, was to be seen, and the conductor stepped from the train to help her aboard. The old lady did not stir, and the conductor said, "Step on board, lady, so we can go on." Then her mouth opened, and she said: "Laws, I don't want to get aboard. I stopped you to send word to my folks that I was coming up tomorrow, and I want you to tell John to meet me at the station to care for my baggage."

Then she stopped, for the train was moving, the conductor having given the signal to start without waiting to learn where "John" and "my folks" lived, while the old lady looked as though she thought train officials were not very accommodating when they would not even carry a message for her.—Hartford Courant.

An Actor's Unknown Friend.

"Joe Jefferson," said an old theater goer, "had taken a lady to a restaurant, and when he put his hand in his pocket to pay his bill he didn't feel a penny. He explained his position to the cashier, but the cashier 'didn't know him.' The perspiration began to ooze when a gentleman stepped up, laid a twenty dollar bill on the desk, and said:

"'I know you, sir; allow me to settle.'

"Jefferson was profuse in his thanks, and when near the door, said:

"'You must give me your name and address, sir, in order that I may call around tomorrow and settle.'

"'Never mind that,' said the stranger with a smile. 'That bill was a counterfeit and I got seventeen dollars in change.'"—St. Louis Chronicle.

DIED.

STEWARD—Near Big Pine, May 8, 1892, James B. Steward, a native of Maine, aged 58 years.

Sheriff Gorman visited Bishop early in the week.

Web. Walker came up from Olancha early in the week.

Ernest Laird passed through town on Wednesday on his way to Bishop with a bunch of horses.

Six inches of snow fell at Bridgeport last week. That's more like winter tarrying in the lap of summer.

J. Smith went to Wild Rose with his big team early in the week to haul wood for Frank Fitzgerald.

There was a row of some sort at Keeler last week in which a Chinaman was badly used up. There are no particulars.

Silas Reynolds came in from Modock last week on a visit. He reports mining matters in a flourishing condition there.

The cattle men will make a grand round-up on Sunday preparatory to starting for Long Valley with the cattle for the summer.

Kinsley & Mead's big team went north early in the week. They had on over twelve tons of freight—a good load for fourteen animals.

The recent change in the C. & C. time card does not effect the southern division. The stage will leave Independence at the same time as formerly.

Mrs. S M. Bell will be at Independence next Monday with a fine assortment of ladies' and children's hats. She will also visit Lone Pine on Wednesday.

P. H. Mack Esq. of Independence and J. S Bourland of Bishop started for San Francisco last Saturday to attend the Odd Fellows' Grand Lodge which met on Wednesday.

A special meeting of the Board of Supervisors will be held at Independence on May 18th to make arrangements for a special election of a supervisor to succeed the late J. B. Steward at Big Pine.

Mrs. James Jones of Fish Springs has been very ill for the past two weeks. Her children were taken with the measles and in nursing them she contracted the disease. Dr. I. J. Woodin is in constant attendance.

Mrs. Mollie Crough of Big Pine accompanied by her sister, Miss Coyle, spent several days in town this week. Miss Coyle is canvassing the field with the view of opening a dress-making establishment.

Jack Welsh and George Gilliam are constructing a large arastra at Fish Springs. They were in town several days this week procuring materials. There is plenty of ore on the dump to keep the arastra running when completed.

Louis Lankshire, an old time Plumasite, visited Inpependence during the week. He went to Bishop yesterday and will visit Keeler to-day. He has been in poor health and came to Inyo to get the benefit of a warm climate.

The Ladies' Aid Society of Lone Pine will give a pic-nic at Bagoles' Grove tomorrow. Various refreshments including ice cream, chocolate and cake will be sold, the proceeds to go to the new church fund. All are invited to attend and an enjoyable time is assured.

The prospects are now excellent for a good racing programme at the coming fair. The Finance Committee of the Fair Directors circulated a subscription list last Saturday and secured upwards of eight hundred dollars. This amount will yet be increased, and with the entrance fees added, a number of good purses can be given.

Messrs Conger and Persons arrived at Independence on Tuesday after visiting the upper end of the Valley. They both express themselves as being delighted with the country and expect to return at no distant date. They went south on Wednesday's train, Mr. Conger going to Los Angeles and Mr. Persons to San Francisco.

A traveling man who chanced to be in the store of E. V. Wood, at McKees Rocks Pa., says while he was waiting to see Mr. Wood, a little girl came in with an empty bottle labeled Chamberlain's Pain Balm and said: "Mamma wants another bottle of that medicine; she says it is the best medicine for rheumatism she ever used." 50 cent bottles for sale by

Lone Pine News.

Every one here seems busy making the most of the fine weather—even the loafers put forth strenuous efforts to gain the shady side of a building.

Mr. Brooks, who has been surveying for Austin & Co., left for Los Angels a few days ago to join his wife and children.

Mrs. McKenzie and her sister have been visiting in this vicinity for the past few weeks.

Plenty of strangers in town who came expecting to get work on the ditch.

Last Sunday evening the church people held a concert at the school house under the supervision of Rev Mr. Winsor; those who attended pronounced it very good.

Next Saturday there is to be ice-cream and cake in the grove for the benefit of the proposed new church.

Mrs. Fitzgerald and children are visiting in town.

Yesterday the genial stage driver of Lone Pine drove around and after bundling in numerous small fry, lunch and so on, started for the river. Stopped at his home, took in more passengers and fish-poles; changed horses and on again until Mrs. Hannigan's was reached, where another stop was made, more passengers, lunch and poles taken in, and then across the river, where we camped for the day. Every-day cares and burdens were left in Lone Pine and we were all children together; a day we shall always remember, not only for the pleasant time, but for the kind hearts that prepared such a treat for the little sick girl. The homeward trip was made by moonlight, enlivened by a chuck-hole or two, a squealing pig our friend had brought, and the howling of a two-year-old girl and a three months old baby.

Obituary.

On Sunday last James B. Steward died at his home near Big Pine. A year ago he was taken with the prevalent grip from which he never fully recovered. Last fall he was again taken with the same malady. About three weeks ago, while the measles were epidemic at Big Pine, he contracted the disease and his constitution being weakened by the grip, he was unable to recover.

Mr. Steward was a pioneer mill-man of Inyo County and for many years had a saw-mill and lumber yard near Big Pine. Of late years, however, he devoted his time exclusively to farming. At the last election he was elected supervisor for the third district. He was always present at the meetings of the Board and was earnest in his efforts to promote the welfare of his constituents. The funeral took place last Monday and was largely attended. He was a native of Maine, aged 58 years.

Seeking A Reputation.

Last Saturday a number of Indians about town obtained liquor in some way, immediately organizing a good sized jag. During the course of the orgie an Indian known as Willie Goodale beat another over the head with a rock and left him for dead. Some squaws, however, discovered that he still lived and loaded Mr. Lo into a dead-axe wagon and started for Big Pine. On being informed of the circumstances Sheriff Gorman promptly arrested the stone-wielder who now occupies a position in the county jail awaiting the result of the wounded man's injuries. Willie is a "bad Injun," and is afflicted with a desire to take human life. A short time before this the Sheriff took a pistol from him as he was about to shoot a squaw. A few years sojourn at the bay might serve to cool his fiery blood.

It is reported that the citizens of Lone Pine have sent J. F. Brooks to Los Angeles for the purpose of raising money to complete the Lone Pine canal. It is earnestly to be hoped that he will succeed, as the construction of the canal will prove an incalculable benefit to Lone Pine.

The Democratic County Central Committee met at Independence last Saturday pursuant to call. Resignation of W. O. Meroney as chairman accepted and A. W. Eibeshutz elected to succeed him. P. H. Mack was nominated as a delegate to the State Convention by E. Robinson, Robert O'Neal by P. W. Forbes and Jas. Hutchings by Irv. H. Mulholland, they being elected by acclamation. The time of holding primaries and County Convention will be fixed at a future meeting.

Mr. J. P. Blaize, an extensive real estate dealer in Des Moines, Iowa, narrowly escaped one of the severest attacks of pneumonia while in the northern part of that State during a recent blizzard, says the Saturday Review. Mr. Blaise had occasion to drive several miles during the storm and was so thoroughly chilled that he was unable to get warm, and inside of an hour after his return he was threatened with a severe case of pneumonia or lung fever. Mr. Blaize sent to the nearest drug store and got a bottle of Chamberlain's Cough Remedy, of which he had often heard, and took a number of large doses. He says the effect was wonderful and that in a short time he was breathing quite easily. He kept on taking the medicine and in a few days was able to come to Des Moines. Mr. Blaize regards his cure as simply wonderful. 50 cent bottles for sale by Cakes Without Eggs.

Observing housekeepers quickly learn that Dr. Price's Cream Baking Powder is far superior to other brands in the fact that they never fail to make the finest pastry, and if they wish to be economical they can dispense entirely with eggs and can use a less quantity of butter for shortening purposes. The advantage is not alone in the saving effected but in avoiding the trouble and frequently the great difficulty of securing eggs that are fresh. This is often a serious trouble.

Cakes of various kinds from the informal Griddle Cakes to the stately Bride Cake can be made with Price's Cream Baking Powder, which insures light, sweet and handsome cakes; or when used for Griddle Cakes to be eaten hot enables their production in the shortest space of time, always tender and delicious.

Dr. Price's is the only Baking Powder that contains the white of eggs. None so pure! None so wholesome!

Dr. Price's Cream Baking Powder is reported by all authorities as free from Ammonia, Alum, or any other adulterant. In fact, the purity of this ideal powder has never been questioned.

Superabundance is a trouble; want, a misery; and an exalted station a great burden; but competence is true happiness.

BABY'S GREETING.

My mamma says this is your birthday,
And tells me to wish papa, dear,
Just all the good things I can think of,
To bless him through all the long year.

I think you're the very best papa
That ever a little boy had,
And when I get big I'll be like you,
And never do things that are bad.

So papa, dear, please kiss my dimples,
And hear while I whisper to you
The lovingest wish to your birthday
I find in my baby heart true.

You see every night ere I slumber,
When tired of frolic and play,
I fold my small hands in my mamma's,
And look in her brown eyes and pray:

"May God take good care of my papa"—
And then mamma kisses my cheeks;
Her lips part and softly she murmurs:
"God, hear what the baby voice speaks!"

And so I now pray to the angels
To guard you wherever you roam,
And bring back my darling young papa
To baby and mamma and home.

I hope that each year we're together
May teach us new lessons of joy—
That I may grow old with my papa
And you may grow young with your boy.

FRIEDEL.

Close by the edge of the heath, where the little rivulet which rose in the neighboring forest began to widen its bed, was situated a mill, called the field mill. Day and night its wheel revolved as if it would never stop, and its monotonous clatter increased the feeling of solitude. If the lovely boy playing quietly before the door of the dwelling house had not attracted the attention of the visitor, one could well have believed the field mill was served by an invisible being.

The miller came out of the house, and, stooping over the boy, passed his hand through his flaxen ringlets.

"Now, Friedel," he said, "where is your mother?"

The child, scarcely 4 years old, raised his laughing eyes to his father and cried:

"Why, there, there! in the garden." And with that he pointed off across the yard, which was bordered with stables.

"Run and get her; I wish to speak with her," said the miller, and taking the boy up he pressed a kiss on his brow and then let him spring away.

The miller Gerard, with an old servant, attended to the mill, which he inherited from his father. For years a faithful wife had shared his joys and sorrows with him; for not always had they seen good times. When bad harvests occurred, or a hail storm destroyed the fields of the industrious peasants, there was but little work and small profit. Then for many days the field mill stood still, and the miller went through his possessions with care ladened heart.

In one such hard time God gave them a son, who, at his baptism, received the name of Gottfried. With him happiness and contentment came back to the field mill. And as the miller was a true hearted, honorable man, his customers remained loyally with him, and after the hard times, as before, brought their grain to the mill. As sunshine followed rain, so good times followed bad.

Friedel grew visibly. An amusing boy, he sweetened many hours for his parents. He also knew how to appear well with old Nero, the watchdog. He never teased any animal, and he was very sorry when the cat played a long time with a mouse or rat before she killed her prey—which was her nature, you know. The bright flowers in the garden were his dearest companions; from them he wound nosegays and wreaths with which he ornamented the windows and pictures.

Thus the little son entered his sixth year, and the time drew near when they must take him to school. Friedel rejoiced greatly at that, for, from the talk of his good mother, school must be a wonderland in which one saw and learned a thousand new things. The way thither was long; the village with which the field mill belonged lay a league—an hour's time—distant, and although Friedel had been over the road a few times, the land and people of his native surroundings were quite strange to him.

Now the great day was come. The wagon stood ready before the door, and within, in the little room, they drew on the boy's overcoat; for just at first, winter again bade farewell to humanity, whirled about yet many times, and shrieked with anger because it must go at last.

"Come, come! the horses never stand," called the father to the loiterer. Out of the door stepped the mother and her little son and got into the wagon. The father took his place upon the front seat and away they went, in the early morning.

That was a day full of events. First Friedel was led, with many other children, into a great room in which a crowd of people sat. Then a gentleman, dressed in dark clothes, with a long, flowing robe and a white ruff, had come in, had greeted every child in a very friendly manner, and had spoken much of the dear God and their parents; also saying that the place where the little children would now come in daily was a very sacred place, where one was really sensible of the omnipresence of God; therefore they must, by great industry and constant attention, always cause God and their teacher to rejoice.

But the greatest pleasure had arisen when another worthy gentleman had, all at once, brought in a great basket which was heaped full of paper cornets of sugar, and the largest—yes, the largest—had come to Friedel. Truly that was a delightful place—the school!

The good impression which the school made on Friedel that first day was never effaced. The miller's child was the darling of the teacher and the pupils. In grasping and retaining ideas, Friedel was the best scholar. And he would, moreover, always have caught the best ideas in all branches of study, had not an inclination to inattention in his own work been to him undoubtedly unlawful.

"What a pity," the old village chorister had often said to Friedel's father, "that the youth has so much levity."

Whipping had done no good, and, moreover, the teacher and his parents were not friendly to that.

"It will subside even yet," the miller often said; "seriousness comes with years."

That was not the case with Friedel. The older he grew, the gayer and more wanton he appeared. He sang and leaped about all the day, wrestled with his comrades at school, climbed the highest trees, waded through swamps and brooks where they were the deepest, and had rash plans of a thousand kinds in his head. Nevertheless, he was a good feeling youth, who performed his tasks punctually. They passed so easily through his hand that he used only a short time for those over which many another pupil worked long hours. Friedel would always learn only new things; for the old he knew by heart.

"He is a double allowance," the master often said; "he is a vocative!" That was his favorite name for the pupil who very often vexed him, and even that could not express it.

A single stupid trick became momentous for the frivolous boy and his anxious father. A little pond emptied its water into the brook that supplied the field mill. This pond was the property of the steward, who had made therein a place for breeding fish. One evening Friedel stood on the sluice through which the water flowed off, and poked with a stick in the grating of the gate, which was stopped up with grass and earth.

"That would make a fine waterfall, if only it would let out more," thought the boy. A plug held the sluice gate at sufficient height above the mirror like surface of the pond.

"One can certainly put that somewhat lower," said Friedel, pulling at the plug, and drawing it, at last, from the hole.

But the gate was too heavy for the boy; the rod which joined the lower board with the upper strong edge fell out of the trembling hand, the gate sank down, and a great water flood rushed through the now opened outlet. Although the boy at first sprang back terrified, he moved nearer again, and rejoiced at the newly created, impetuous, foaming waterfall. The evil results which must follow his thoughtless deed he did not comprehend, else he would have gone hastily for help. For some time yet he watched the imposing spectacle, then hastened away.

Miller Gerard had just been called to supper, when the servant, hurrying after him, came and told him the water was rising remarkably fast. The wheel could hold out but little longer. Surely an opening must have been made somewhere. While the assistant was speaking, a hissing and roaring forced its way to the miller's ear. With two or three bounds he was in the mill. The wheel revolved as frantically as if it would grind itself to powder, and the water poured in in streams through the lock, so that the whole floor was covered.

"God help us!" cried the miller. "Stop the wheel, shut the upper gate and open the outlet pipe."

The servant, as alarmed as his master, hurried out, and tried with much labor to give the wildly rushing waters another course, and at last partially succeeded. Some sacks with flour in them, ready for use, were soaked through and through; others, containing corn, lay overthrown in the water. The wheel stopped at last. The miller could not explain to himself this excessive waterflow. He hastened to put things in order that he might go to the foundation of this serious affair. Gerard stood still, sweating over the unlucky situation, when a man burst in at the door, rushed furiously at the amazed miller, and breathlessly exclaimed:

"What possessed you, sir, what possessed you to draw off my water! to open the sluice without saying anything to me about it! How dare you do it! But only wait, it shall cost you dear—dear! What is lost to me in the pond, that you count out to me in cash, as surely as I am the steward!"

"Sir steward, you here!" cried the astonished miller. "But I do not understand you, truly I do not understand," he continued. "The sluice opened? If Heaven verify me, I have enough, yes, too much water; I need no deluge. But there, see for yourself what injury I have suffered," and he motioned the speaker into the meal room.

"Indeed, indeed! Who could it have been, then?" asked the steward.

"A knavish churl, a madman," cried the miller, "who must have escaped from the house of correction, or from"——

"And my fish," interrupted the steward, "are more than half destroyed. By good fortune, I took a pleasure ride along the pond, this evening, else all would have been lost. Yet I shall cause an investigation to be made; the miscreant must not escape us."

Friedel was sauntering along by the brook after he had so calmly committed the evil deed, when he saw the steward ride at full speed across the field to the mill. He became really anxious, and foreboded nothing good, since he knew that very man was the owner of the pond. He sneaked noiselessly away amid the bushes that grew along the edge of the brook behind the field mill. When near the latter, he hid behind a willow thicket to await the steward's departure. He saw his father and this man come out by the mill-wheel, and observed that both gesticulated vehemently, inspecting the wheel as well as the water course. Friedel softly moved nearer in order to understand, if possible, what they were saying to each other. To his terror these words fell on his ear:

"Five and twenty I count out to him with my own hand, then off with him to the house of correction." It was the steward who spoke.

That this was not laid to the steward's son Friedel very well knew. He had a boy of the same age as Friedel who went with him in the same classes at school. Hans was an indolent pupil, and was therefore far below Friedel, who was second in the class. The well known vexation which the steward's child felt at that was also felt by his father, and so his schoolmate's parents were not kindly disposed toward Friedel.

As the boy heard from the mouth of his enemy the severe penalty, which, he took for granted, would fall upon him, an unutterable fear seized him. He had certainly not meant to do an evil deed. Was he then a criminal, that they threatened him with the house of correction? Could his father have agreed to it? Would he count out to him twenty-five blows with a stick? No, he should never risk that, he would rather go away—far, far away, out into the world. Such thoughts sped through the mind of the terrified boy. He saw then how his father shook the steward's hand in a friendly manner and heard the latter say:

"Thus it remains."

Then Friedel turned back into the thick bushes. For a time he debated whether he should fall at the feet of his stern father and beg for forgiveness, or whether it would not be better to run away—far off!—whither he himself did not know. Then the latter resolve prevailed.

Friedel sprang up. Once again he looked at the field mill, then turned away and ran as fast as he could to the forest. He had not reached this when he heard behind him on the field road, into which he had turned, the tramping of a horse's feet.

"The steward, the steward!" he cried to himself, and once more quickened his pace, without even looking behind, and his flying feet did not rest until the forest was reached. On a moss covered rock, which lay between a bush and a tree, the fugitive sat down.

The sun had set. In the west the clouds in the high canopy of heaven had arrayed themselves in robes of golden red. It was so still, so slumbrous in the wood. Mysterious whisperings, which sounded very wonderful to the miller child, lurked in the shadowy roof of leaves. Old tales of good fairies and wood sprites, which the mother had told the boy of 71 years on winter evenings in the cosy little room, came into his mind and excited his fancy. The knotty trunks of the oaks there in the background seemed to come to life; they stretched out their branches to him like arms eager to imprison, as if they would hold him—the fugitive—fast. The bushes round about looked, in the twilight, like gray little men, who sat there, close together and thoughtful, with bowed heads. Friedel dared hardly breathe. Still darker it became; nothing was longer astir. Those inhabitants of the woods, the merry birds, were long since in bed. Cowering low, the boy sat there. Slowly his head sank on his breast; he tried to support it with his hands. Then, exhausted by fear and distress, he fell asleep.

At the field mill the evening was an active one. People hastened hither and thither, reached with poles through the bed of the mill creek, and the miller ever urged them to new investigation.

"I have not seen him for some time," said the servant to the miller's wife. "Friedel was by the brook."

"O God!" said the miller's wife through her tears; "he surely was not drowned and swept away."

"He is a bad, fool hardy fellow," said Miller Gerard, "still were the punishment too great. O God! let him not perish; spare him to us, thou Heavenly Father!"

The search was suspended without any result. The people, discouraged, returned to the mourning parents to disband. They promised to come again, the next morning, to examine the brook further down.

That was a sad night for the miller and his wife. Neither of them closed their eyes, because of sorrow and anxiety for their son. At last the morning dawned. Gerard let the mill stand still, and unchained his little boat to go down the brook to search anew for his darling child, for he could not think otherwise than that Friedel had found his death in the wild flood of yesterday.

A peasant beckoned to him from the bank and cried:

"Miller, I saw your son yesterday evening in the woods as I was going into them, but he ran so fast that I could not overtake him."

"Impossible," said Gerard. "The servant declared that Friedel was playing here on the bank, and had surely been drawn into the stream by the flood which burst forth from the rupture of the sluice."

"You can believe it or not," replied the peasant. "I saw your Gottfried before me with body and soul; who knows what stupid trick he has played again, that he must needs show his heels in such a manner." With that the speaker went his way.

The miller delayed starting again. A thought flashed through his head.

"How," he mused, "if Friedel even—the sluice—yet, no, he was certainly here when the disaster occurred."

Quickly he steered the boat to the shore and stepped out. The people, who, yesterday evening, stood by him ready to help, came once again to the field mill. Gerard told them what he had heard from the peasant. They were ready to go to the forest also, and went on their way. The miller followed them.

How long Friedel slept he knew not. It was still quite dark when he awoke. The twittering of birds sounded around and convinced the runaway, rubbing his sleepy eyes, that he did not dream, that he was really there in the dense forest. Suddenly the bitter reality passed before him. He would raise himself and remain sitting, as if spellbound. His joints were stiff and he was perceptibly chilly. With great effort he at last stood on his feet. Tears rolled down his cheeks. A great yearning for home seized him; but he thought again of the severe punishment, of the angry steward, and hastily turned his steps once more to the woods. Yet he went forward slowly into the wet bushes. After half an hour's wandering Friedel came to a wood road. The day had fully dawned. How beautiful it was here! How the bright rays of the sun warmed the trees! The boy sat down on the stump of a tree. He felt very weak; he had eaten nothing since yesterday noon, and he was very hungry and thirsty. But back—no, he dared not go back!

"But whither, in reality, does this way lead? and where will I go when its end is reached?" the child asked himself.

"Ah!" something cried within him, "go back again to thy father! Confess! confess what thou hast done, and surely he will forgive thee! Art thou not already punished enough for thy indiscretion? Wert thou not obliged to learn how bitter it is to be lost? Take thyself back, take thyself back to thy father's house!"

It was to Friedel as if an angel spoke to him. He ran along the road; he heard a gentle splashing; curious, he moved near. From between stones overgrown with thick moss gushed forth clear, fresh water, which took its course across the way.

"That is surely our stream," said the boy to himself. "Now I go with thee, my little brook, thou leadest to mine, to mine!"

Before Friedel began his journey homeward, he drank his fill of the clear, cool water, then he followed the course of the brook back. He must have wandered some hours ere he stepped out of the forest. There before him in the distance lay the field mill. Ah, how his heart beat. But he hesitated not in going forward; he went bravely on and reached his beloved home.

The sun had reached the zenith. The mill-wheel stood still. In the yard quiet reigned supreme. The kennel was deserted, the house door was locked. A window stood half open. Friedel clambered upon the bank which was before the house, and looked in at the window. Within was only the old house clock, ticking solemnly. Lightly he pressed the window wide open, and quickly crept through. Then he got his school books and sat down on the settle. He had not been there long when he heard voices in the yard. The door was opened, his parents entered, weeping. Sobbing bitterly his mother buried her head in the sofa cushion.

"Ah! we would certainly forgive him all were he only here again!—but he is dead—dead—our only child!" said the father, wiping his eyes.

Friedel could not restrain himself longer. With a bound he sprang forward, threw himself at the feet of his terrified and astonished father and clung about his knees.

"Father, dear! darling mother!" he cried, "I will truly no longer be so frivolous, never again run away, but try to be always good! Do not beat me! No, no! do not send me to the house of correction!"

The joy of the good parents was indescribable. The father made no more mention of the sluice. He indeed surmised all before Freidel had confessed to him his mad trick.

Friedel also brought himself into peaceable relations with the steward. From that time the teacher no longer had to complain over his "vocation." With earnestness and zeal Friedel devoted himself to his work, and was often spoken of as a model scholar.

That he will become an excellent man, if he goes forward thus, no one doubts. Still he diligently helps his father in the field mill. But the pastor and the chorister would make something yet greater of the intelligent boy. God give his blessing thereto.—Adapted from the German by Anna E. H. Sands for The Springfield Homestead.

Found a Market for Apple Seeds

There are few things in this world without value, as a Vermont farmer can testify after a recent experiment. He made cider of his apple crop, and did well with that. He also picked the seeds out of the presses and sold them at a handsome price for use in the manufacture of prussic acid. He got a bushel of seeds from every 140 bushels of apples.

Few of Its Sort Left.

The killing of an otter in the Willimantic river by a Connecticut hunter recently, has been the cause of considerable comment and newspaper mention. The otter, like the beaver and the buffalo, is soon destined to become a thing of the past.

Two Queer Organizations.

There are in England, as in all old and wealthy countries, numerous people of wealth and culture who "kill time" by devotion to harmless fads. One British society, composed of elderly maiden ladies and clergymen, has for its object the restoration of the house of Stuart and the "reconquering of the American colonies!" Another respectable body, entitled "Israel's Identification association," seeks to show that the ten lost tribes of Israel are the British people. An address has been delivered before it by the Rev. Philip Carlyon, who argued that the ten lost tribes migrated from the regions near the Euphrates to the Carpathians, from thence to the shores of the Baltic, and thence in the course of time to England, so that the ancient English were of Hebrew origin. The Rev. Mr. Carlyon quoted from the Book of Esdras the statement that the ten lost tribes "wandered across the sources of the Euphrates to a region called Arsareth," and he said that this statement was corroborated by Herodotus, a contemporary of Esdras.

Seeking Wealth Away from Home.

The natives of Japan are taking advantage of the removal of the restrictions on travel to foreign lands. Since the Mikado permitted his subjects to emigrate, a recent writer says that nearly 100,000 of them have left their native land. There are about 20,000 in Hawaii. There is a large number in Australia. They are to be found in various countries of the Asiatic continent, and some are in Europe. There are about 2,000 in California, and others are constantly arriving there to work in the vineyards. In the city of New York there may be 200 Japanese, and there are a few in many other American cities. Wherever they go they have the reputation of being industrious and inoffensive. The population of Japan is 40,000,000.

A NEW BOOK FOR FARMERS.

Readers of this paper, who desire to inform themselves on modern machinery adapted to farm work, should write to Baker & Hamilton, San Francisco, for a copy of their latest catalogue of Agricultural Implements and Vehicles. It is a handsomely illustrated book of 216 pages, and describes every implement used by the farmer. It will be sent free to anyone sending for it. In writing state that the catalogue mentioned in this paper is the one desired.

SAFETY IN THE MIDST OF DANGER.

This would seem a contradiction—is so, in fact, to the eye. But experience has proved its possibility. Take the case of the individual who dwells in a malarious region. A robust constitution is no certain defence against the dreaded chills. "What is?" Recorded testimony, covering a period little short of half a century, proves that Hostetter's Stomach Bitters is precisely this. This continent does not limit the field where the medicine has proved its efficacy. In South America, the Isthmus of Panama, Mexico, everywhere in fact where miasma-born disease takes on its most obstinate and formidable types, the Bitters is a recognized specific in illimitable demand, and prescribed by physicians of repute. Potent, too, is it in disorders of the stomach, liver and bowels, and against that destroyer, la grippe. It improves appetite and sleep, neutralizes rheumatism and kidney complaints.

When conscience forsakes a man the spirit of God does so, too.

BEWARE OF OINTMENTS FOR CATARRH THAT CONTAIN MERCURY,

As mercury will surely destroy the sense of smell and completely derange the whole system when entering it through the mucous surfaces. Such articles should never be used except on prescriptions from reputable physicians, as the damage they will do is ten fold to the good you can possibly derive from them. Hall's Catarrh Cure, manufactured by F. J. Cheney & Co., Toledo, O., contains no mercury, and is taken internally, and acts directly upon the blood and mucous surfaces of the system. In buying Hall's Catarrh Cure be sure you get the genuine. It is taken internally, and made in Toledo, Ohio, by F. J. Cheney & Co.

KEEP THE UPPER HAND OF DISEASE.

Changes of temperature are apt to cause dangerous sickness; in the full-blooded apoplexy is to be feared. When you have a pain in the head, feel dizzy, feverish, rheumatic or sick at the stomach take at once three to ten of BRANDRETH'S PILLS. Such slight affections are only the harbingers of disease or sudden prostration, and the thing to do is to master the trouble at once. Never let a little sickness get the better of you. Drive it out of doors immediately. Let there be no compromise, always have with you a box of BRANDRETH'S PILLS, and you are prepared to fight the worst form of sickness in its incipiency.

We are by no means aware how much we are influenced by our passions.

DON'T GIVE UP and say there is no help for Catarrh, Hay Fever and Cold in head, since thousands testify that Ely's Cream Balm has entirely cured them.

I HAVE been bothered with catarrh for about twenty years; I had lost sense of smell entirely, and I had almost lost my hearing. My eyes were getting so dim I had to get some one to thread my needle. Now I have my hearing as well as I ever had, and I can see to thread as fine a needle as ever I did, my sense of smell seems to be improving all the time. I think there is nothing like Ely's Cream Balm for Catarrh.—Mrs. E. E. Grimes, Rendrill, Perry Co., O.

The old saying that "consumption can be cured if taken in time" was poor comfort. It seemed to invite a trial, but to anticipate failure. The other one, not so old, "consumption can be cured," is considered by many false.

Both are true and not true; the first is prudent—one cannot begin too early.

DR. G. W. LEEK'S GOOD FORTUNE.

Few men in the world have ever been so fortunate as Dr. Leek. A history of this young man will read like a dream. We say young since he is only 34 years old. He graduated with honors in 1879 at Santa Rosa, in the then Christian College, (now a convent) and with one year's instruction in dentistry, he commenced to climb the ladder of fame till now not a land in the civilized world that has not heard of his wonderful achievements in dentistry. It may be doubted that the science of phrenology can foretell any latent talent, yet Dr. Leek showed our city reporter an examination chart made out by the world's most famous phrenologist, O. S. Fowler, dated two years before the date of Dr. Leek's wonderful discovery that any tooth may be extracted painlessly without the use of any of the dangerous dental gas used by the dental profession. In the written examination O. S. Fowler said D. Leek possessed one of the most wonderful brains he ever examined, and that its mobility equalled a steam-engine under one hundred pounds pressure, and that he could make a living at anything, even oratory, but of all occupations by all means choose dentistry, as that is a new profession wherein mechanical skill and inventive genius can be brought into play; follow that, exclusively avoiding tea, coffee, wines and tobacco, because you are too high strung already, and I will guarantee that you will some day be known the world over as one of the smartest of smart men. As further evidence of this wonderful man, Dr. Dio Lewis, who toured this State in 1876 lecturing on health and reading character from the face or hair or from seeing the walk of any person 30 yards away, made a reputation for himself among the people of Sonoma county when he gave out that he would read any person's character and tell him what business he was most suited for simply by seeing him walk across the rear end of the hall, and that he would read every person's characteristic qualities who wished it read, free every night, it is useless to say the largest hall could not begin to hold the people during the week's course of lectures. On the last night Dr. Leek was chosen, when only a boy, out of 90 walkers, as the one having the best walk from a scientific standpoint, and for years he was guyed by his unsuccessful rivals, and says he not unfrequently has some of his old friends and schoolmates remind him of Dr. Rio Lewis' wonderful praise, when he loudly called out, "There goes my boy! there he is! bring him here," and said he took great pleasure in introducing Santa Rosa's great boy. "Nay, I will correct that" said the professor, "I have made a mistake, I should have said California's greatest boy. Live as you should live and I guarantee that not a listener in this vast assemblage will some day fail to let their friends know that they knew George William Leek of Santa Rosa." Now with these coincidences of character-reading and their prediction, we can proudly say that our boy has not disgraced us, and that his name has reached the smallest part of the globe where mankind inhabit. The last nobility to visit Dr. Leek of San Francisco from any great distance, is his Majesty the King of the Gilbert Island, who besides himself brought his chief and his pilot and interpreter for the express purpose of visiting Dr. Leek, whom they heard of as the great American dentist who can extract teeth painlessly and plant new teeth that are as good as nature's production.

You can't believe some dealers always. They want to sell the medicine that pays them the largest profit. What you want to buy is the one that does you the most good.

Which one is it?

Sometimes, it may be a matter of doubt. But, in the case of Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription, there's no room for doubt. It's a matter that can be proved.

With the facts before you, it's an insult to your intelligence to have something else offered as "just as good."

And here's the proof: Among all the medicines that claim to cure woman's peculiar weaknesses, irregularities, and diseases, the "Favorite Prescription" is the only one that's guaranteed.

If it doesn't do all that's claimed for it, if it doesn't give satisfaction in every case, you'll have your money back.

There's strength and vigor for every tired and feeble woman, health and a new life for every delicate and ailing woman—and if there's no help, there's no pay.

VACATION.

I've been having a little vacation, wife,
And 'twas better than I can tell;
Up at the farm, with the old home life,
Ere we came to the city to dwell.

And just as I left it was everything there,
Father and mother and all.
The hills were as green, and the skies were as fair,
And the trees were just as tall.

And father was getting in hay, you know,
And he wanted me to load;
'Twas the clover and herds grass, so heavy that grow
In the meadow across the road,

And those fractious old oxen were just the same
Sharp horned, with the brass button tips.
I helped fasten them on the day they came,
'Twas the year of the great eclipse.

When the long, long beautiful day was o'er
And the lowing cows came home,
My mother stood there at the open door
And she called to the children to come.

For supper was ready, so one and all
We tumbled and laughed with glee,
In our haste to answer the welcome call,
——"Why wife—what's the matter with me?"

And the old wife bowed o'er the old man's head
And smoothed down his scant, gray hair,
And her kiss and a tear were one, as she said,
"You've been having a nap in your chair."

CLEANING OUT PIRATES.

From Singapore, situated at the extreme end of the Malay peninsula, the China sea to the north for four hundred miles is studded with islands. They number, great and small, a good hundred. Some are not more than an acre in extent, and some are fifteen miles long. A portion of these islands is occupied by Malays, and the remainder by Dyaks. The first come from the peninsula, and the second from Borneo. There is but little difference between the two races, but what there is favors the Dyak. He is cleaner in his habits and has more mercy on his captives.

Up to the year 1850 these islands in the China sea were the rendezvous of pirates. There was at this time some international dispute about the islands and John Bull fought shy of complicating matters by opening a war on people who even boasted that they were pirates.

In this emergency the foreign traders on the peninsula, assisted by others in Siam and along the China coast, bought the brig Campa of her Scotch owners and quietly fitted her out as a man-of-war. She was a large, stout and handsome craft, and she was outfitted at Pahang. She was armed with nine guns on a side, with a "Long Tom" on a swivel, and when she left Pahang she had 130 men aboard. That was crowding her somewhat, but as she was a clean, new ship and well provisioned there was no growling. Her crew had been picked up at half a dozen different points, and were all sailors and white men. I am quite sure that the captain and lieutenant and fourteen English sailors aboard were quietly drafted from H. M. S. Kildare, but the others were runaway sailors from various American, French, German and Russian ships. When the brig went out of Pahang she was a match for anything of her size ever floated, and no crew were ever under better discipline. She carried three extra boats, and, as I had helped to stow her ammunition, I knew that she had a great plenty.

There were men on the peninsula who were in communication with the pirates, and to befog them we ran off up the Gulf of Siam until we sighted Cape Campodia. Then we headed to the northeast, and at once began the work of disguising the brig. An old set of sails were bent on, the paint pots brought out, and in the course of twenty-four hours we made the Relief, as she was called, look like a tea barge or a trader. It was no use to hunt pirates with a man-of-war. They were altogether too sharp to be caught under her guns.

We cruised up and down the China sea for a week, keeping well over toward the Borneo coast, but met with no adventure. Then we got the tail end of a hurricane, which we rode out safely, and after it subsided we limped along to the north with foretopmasts down and sails torn and rent. A sailor looking at us from a distance of half a mile would have said that we had pulled through by the skin of our teeth. A dead calm usually follows a storm in that sea, and as we were opposite Opokonoke, or the westernmost island of the Philippine group, we were not surprised to find ourselves within five or six miles of the green coast and without steerage way. This was the state of affairs at sunrise on a very sultry morning, and as the tide set shoreward we drifted in for a couple of miles and then let go our anchor in forty feet of water.

The Dyaks not only had as good marine glasses as any ship carried, but they had erected platforms in the tops of tall trees, and could see as far out over the ocean as a man at our masthead could see inland. We knew that they infested that island, and had no doubt we should soon be an object of scrutiny. For this reason all but a dozen men were sent below, and those remaining on deck were dressed as merchant sailors. There was a man or two in the rigging, apparently engaged in making repairs, but really to watch the coast, and at about high noon it was reported that a sampan was approaching. The craft is a sort of Indian canoe made of bark, and in this case there was but one occupant. He was doubtless coming as a scout to see how matters stood. He came straight on until within half a mile of us, and then halted and took a long survey. Our ports were up, yards askew, a lot of raffle hanging over the stern, and it did not take him long to determine that we were a merchantman in distress. To further this idea we waved a white cloth at him, as if inviting him to come on board. He came no nearer, although he stood up and waved his arms, as if saying that he would return to the shore and bring us help. Back he went, paddling with all his might, and then we felt quite sure that the game was in our hands. The crew were called to quarters, shot, shell, and grape passed up, and when cutlasses and pistols had been served out we were ready.

As the tide was setting inshore the brig's stern was toward the island. We quietly tailed on to the spring which had been set and brought her starboard broadside to bear. This maneuver might have aroused the suspicions of the Dyaks had we not taken so much pains to disguise the brig. As it was, they doubtless argued that it was for the purpose of assisting us in our repairs. At any rate, at about 3 o'clock in the afternoon, we caught sight of their fleet coming out. The sea was smooth and glassy, and we could see the craft almost as soon as they left shore. There were five of the native craft called prahns. These are clumsy looking affairs to a European, but, as a matter of fact, are light, buoyant and quite safe in a heavy sea. None of those approaching us had masts or sails, but were propelled by rowers. Each had a small iron cannon mounted on the bows, and the rowing and steering was done from behind a screen or partition, which crossed the boat about a third of its length from the bow. As they came nearer we could count about twenty men in front of each screen. Some had muskets, and all had the sword like weapon called a kris.

While our guns were loaded and the ports ready to be dropped the most of our crew were out of sight behind the bulwarks. The prahns came on in line until about half a mile away, and then they formed in a line the other way. That is, each was now bow on to us, with an interval of not more than ten feet between them. You would have thought they would play the hypocrite a bit and try and get aboard of us without any fighting or loss of life, but that isn't Dyak nature. They didn't mean to spare a soul of us, and they probably hoped for a little shindy to make matters more exciting. They got it, sure enough. At a given signal each one of their howitzers sent a solid ball whizzing at us. Every man raised a yell, and the five prahns dashed forward to board us. We let them come within a quarter of a mile before we dropped the ports and run out nine guns, loaded with short fuse shell and grape. "Bang!" "bang!" "bang!" went gun after gun, the muzzle of each depressed for the short range, and, although we could see nothing for the smoke, we heard enough to satisfy us that great havoc had been wrought.

While we waited for the smoke to lift some object dashed against the brig, and next moment we were being boarded by about thirty Dyaks. They belonged to a prahn which had escaped injury, and you can judge what manner of men they were. While they must have realized that they had caught a Tartar, and while our broadside had sunk or disabled the other craft, this solitary one hoped to carry us by a dash. She'd have done it, too, had we been a merchantman, for she reached us under cover of the smoke, and no sooner had we felt the shock of contact than twenty-five or thirty swarthy fellows were on the rail. We opened on them with our pistols and then sailed in with the steel, but before we had overcome them they had cut down three men and wounded two more. One fellow, who seemed to be a leader, kept six of us away from him for four or five minutes, and the way he handled his kris would have done honor to a fencing master.

When those left in the prahn saw how the fight was going they backed her off, but a solid shot was clapped into one of the guns, the muzzle depressed at the right moment and the shot sank the craft as if she had been loaded with stone. Two of the prahns were sneaking shoreward, though badly battered, when Long Tom was turned loose on them and finished the job. A dozen sampans had come out at the opening of the fight, some carrying one and some two men and these picked up a few stragglers and took them to shore. As was afterward known, the number of warriors who came out was 143. Of these only eleven escaped death at our hands. We had no sooner disposed of the prahns than four boats were dropped, each filled with twelve well armed men, and then we pulled for the beach. The anchor was lifted and the brig drifted in after our soundings until she brought up in four fathoms within musket shot of the beach. Then we lay off for half an hour while she plied the woods with her shells, and when we landed it was to meet with a scene of devastation. There had been a good sized village just opposite the brig, and such of it as had not been knocked to pieces by her shells was now on fire. We found about thirty dead bodies, men, women and children, and in the mouth of a small river were three prahns and about twenty sampans. These we destroyed, and after the brig had turned her shells loose again as a good-by we went on board. The forest was now on fire in twenty places, and the flames were not extinguished until they had burned every tree and bush over a space twenty-five miles long by fifteen broad.

At about sundown we got a land breeze and made an offing. We were not yet through with the pirates. We had simply dosed one batch of them. Standing to the northward all night under a light breeze brought us at daylight about opposite Aratora bay, on the coast of this same island. We still held to our disguise, and as day dawned we hoisted a flag of distress. This bay was known to be a piratical stronghold, and it was soon plain enough that we were going to bag more game. A man sent aloft with the glass reported a large village on the shore, with a great crowd of natives running about in great excitement. We sailed in to within half a mile of the beach, and then dropped anchor with a spring on the cable. We could make out a great fleet of prahns riding at anchor off the beach, but these pirates had more tact and policy than those further down the coast. They did not come rowing out to give us battle the first thing, but a sampan in which were four men came out until within easy hail, and then one of the men hailed us with:

He was informed that we had met with rough weather and lost four of our crew, and was then asked if it were possible for us to ship half a dozen natives to help work the brig across to Saigon. He replied that he would see, and the sampan returned to the shore. After about an hour the same crew returned with the message that we should all come ashore in our boats and surrender as prisoners. He said that they had six guns in a battery on shore trained upon the brig, and that if we did not obey the summons she would be sent to the bottom where she lay. Our first lieutenant did all the talking for us, and now he answered back that we refused to surrender. The natives had perhaps expected this answer, for at a signal from the spokesman in the sampan a battery of six-pounders did open on us at close range. Their gunnery was so poor, however, that only one shot struck the brig in their half hour's cannonade. We wanted to reply, but the orders were to wait. Wait we did, and by and by the battery stopped firing and four big prahns and as many as thirty two man sampans came sweeping out to us.

The fellows were yelling and screaming and beating tomtoms, no doubt expecting an easy victory, and they were within canister range when we dropped the ports and began blazing away. Such men as were not needed to work the guns used muskets, and in ten minutes we had the crowd thoroughly licked. It seemed as if the surface of the sea for acres in extent was covered with black heads and the wrecks of their prahns and sampans. Plenty of the fellows were shot as they drifted about or swam to the shore, and when no one could longer be seen in the water the brig opened her guns on the town and the island. For two good hours she whaled away at them, driving every living thing beyond reach of her guns, and when she went out of the bay everything on land seemed to be ablaze. It was a knockout blow for the stronghold, as the entire fleet and upward of one hundred men were destroyed, but what we had thus far done was only a beginning. There were a dozen more colonies to be looked after.—New York Sun.

LASSOING CONDORS.

Exciting Pastime on the Chilean Plains Years Ago.

SPORT AMONG SOUTH AMERICAN COWBOYS

Killing the Monstrous Vultures of the Lofty Andes.

"Chasing the condor with the lasso was the leading sport on the Chilian plains when I was in that country years ago," said a New Yorker who went to South America with Harry Meiggs, the great railroad contractor, "but I am told that this great bird has become so wary that the sport is now almost unknown. Twenty-five years ago the condor had developed no evidence of cunning that I ever heard of. There was then, as there is now, I believe, a government bounty of five dollars a head paid for the killing of the condor both in Chili and Peru. If the birds are as plenty as they were when I went to that region, wide awake hunters ought to make plenty of money.

"The condor, unlike many other members of the vulture family, doesn't wait for something or somebody to die in order that he may have his dinner, but if he doesn't find a ready made carcass convenient on the plain when he is hungry, he proceeds at once to provide that carcass himself. At least, that used to be his habit, and I presume he hasn't changed any in that respect, providing the material for carcasses is as plenty now as it was then.

"The herds of cattle that pastured on the undulating plains between the impeaetrable wall of the Andes and the Pacific's white crested line of surf, offered the condor unrivaled facilities in his line in those days, and as he seemed to be in a state of chronic hunger, this king of the feathered race levied constant tribute on the grazing herds.

"Twenty-five and thirty years ago it was no uncommon thing to see hundreds of these winged freebooters hovering over the plains, each one a ravenous and determined dinner robber from the herds below, to which the shadow of a condor's wings carried as much terror as the appearance of a hawk does to a brood of chickens.

TRAPPING BIG VULTURES.

"The condor was the greatest enemy the stock raisers in that part of South America had to contend with, and it was his persistent and destructive raids on grazing cattle that made him an outlaw, with a price on his head, to be relentlessly hunted even among the crags and cloud capped peaks where he made his home.

"When a day's old time sport at condor lassoing was to be had the carcass of a steer, a dog or a horse was carried out on the plain. Strong stakes were driven into the ground five or six inches apart, about the carcass, until a roofless inclosure six or seven feet high and twenty feet square, with a gate at one side, was made. Long before the work of making this inclosure could be finished condors would be seen floating down from the clouds, far above which they have their haunts. As long as the workmen were busy at the inclosure the birds would sail high overhead.

"The instant the coast was clear down the great vulture would drop and in a few seconds he would be tearing at the dead body in the inclosure. It is no uncommon thing for a mature condor to have a twelve foot spread of wing, and I have known them to measure fifteen feet from tip to tip of wing. Their bodies are heavy and on the ground the bird is clumsy.

"It cannot rise for flight without running rapidly for a long distance, to give it the necessary momentum, especially if it is gorged with food, which it never fails to be if any food can be obtained. As a consequence, when a condor alighted in one of those inclosures, he was as much of a prisoner as if he were chained down to the ground, and the sportsman kept him there to serve his pleasure.

USING THE LARIAT.

"When he wanted to ride after a condor the owner of the pen generally with a friend or two similarly equipped, mounted a fleet horse, fastened his lariat to the saddle and rode to the inclosure. An attendant opened the gate of the prison and let out a condor for each rider. When the condors found themselves at liberty, they at once started at the top of their speed on the long run that would enable them to take wing.

"After they had run probably one-quarter of the distance the huntsmen put spurs to their horses and dashed after the birds. As the condors arose from the ground with great wings spread, the lassoes were thrown. An expert handler of the lariat would send his rope over the condor's head, and so manage it that it was slipped down until it touched the shoulders of the wings before it would be tightened on the bird.

"The condor was then a prisoner, but able to use his powerful pinions, breathe freely and lead the horseman a wild chase across the plain, turning in all directions in his frantic flight, but unable to rise higher than the length of the lasso. When the rider tired of the sport he would turn his horse about and lead the chase himself, forcing the unwilling bird along until it tumbled spent to the ground and was dragged to death at the horse's heels.

"I never could understand why a condor, captive like that, did not turn on both man and horse and attack them as he would a steer, but I never knew one to do so. Once in awhile a lariat would break while the horseman was bracing his horse against some desperate sweep of a mighty condor, and then both horse and rider would be tumbled violently to the ground, and the suddenly released bird would shoot upward like a cannot ball and soon disappear among the clouds. Condors with several feet of somebody's lariat hanging to them were frequently seen among those that swooped down on the herds."—New York Tribune.

Carbonic Acid Gas in Liquid Form.

At the Guinness brewery in Dublin an attempt is being made to utilize the carbonic acid gas liberated during the process of fermentation. As some 25,000,000,000 gallons of this gas are produced annually in the breweries of the United Kingdom, a great saving will be effected if the new enterprise proves a success in a commercial way. The gas is to be condensed into the liquid form, in which form it sells at eight cents per pound. The makers of soda water, mineral waters, wines "with a pop" and other like drinks will rejoice in the prospects of cheap carbonic acid gas in a convenient form.—New York Telegram.

A Mental Phenomenon

A famous specialist in nervous diseases recently spent an evening with me. I asked him if he had ever come into contact with mental phenomena that science could not explain. He answered:

Yes, I had a very curious experience not long ago. I was on my way to Washington, and had made the acquaintance in the smoking compartment of two cultivated men whose conversation was extremely entertaining. The talk turned upon mind reading, and one of my companions proposed an experiment. I left the compartment and walked to the other end of the car. On my return my friends informed me that they had chosen a woman's name and would will me to guess it. We took hold of hands and sat silent for a time. Gradually my mind became a blank. I could not concentrate my thoughts and a nervous twitching affected my muscles. Pretty soon a name come into my head. I glanced at my companions. They were eying me attentively. As though influenced by an irresistible power I faltered out:

"Edna Dorr."

"That's it," they cried in chorus. "That was the name we had selected."

On my return to New York I found the name of Edna Dorr constantly in my mind. I had never heard it before, and did not know whether it was the name of a living being or simply the product of the experimenters' fancy. Whatever it was it haunted me. I really felt annoyed at my weakness. I began to fear that I had overworked and was in danger of nervous prostration.

One night some weeks later I was called to examine a critical case at a well known hospital. I found that the patient, a young woman, had been fatally shot in a resort on the Bowery. She was dying when I reached her side. Her face bore the marks of refinement and beauty, but a life of dissipation had almost obliterated them. I bent toward her, for I saw that her end was at hand.

"What is your real name?" I asked, knowing that in death she would tell the truth.

"Edna Dorr," she answered. In another moment she was dead.

That is the whole case. Who she was or how my traveling companions happened to select her name I know not. Queer, wasn't it?—New York World.

Hot Summers Long Ago.

A German writer, dealing with certain prognostications of great summer heat, goes back for precedents. In 627, he says, the springs were dried up, and men fainted with the heat. In 879 it was impossible to work in the open fields. In the year 993 the nuts on the trees were "roasted" as if in a baker's oven. In 1000 the rivers in France dried up, and the stench from the dead fish and other matter brought a pestilence into the land. The heat in the year 1014 dried up the rivers and the brooks in Alsace-Lorraine. The Rhine was dried up in the year 1132. In the year 1152 the heat was so great that eggs could be cooked in the sand.

In 1227 it is recorded that many men and animals came by their death through the intense heat. In the year 1303 the waters of the Rhine and the Danube were partially dried up, and people passed over on foot. The crops were burned up in the year 1394, and in 1538 the Seine and the Loire were as dry land. In 1556 a great drought swept through Europe. In 1614 in France and even in Switzerland the brooks and the ditches were dried up. Not less hot were the years 1646, 1679 and 1701. In the year 1715 from the month of March till October not a drop of rain fell; the temperature rose to 38 degs. Reaumur, and in favored places the fruit trees blossomed a second time. Extraordinarily hot were the years 1724, 1746, 1756 and 1811. The summer of 1815 was so hot (the thermometer standing at 40 degs. Reaumur) that the places of amusement had to be closed.—London News.

A Bible with a History.

Washington was a Mason, the master of a lodge, and in that capacity laid the corner stone of the National Capitol at Washington with Masonic ceremony. The Bible upon which he took the oath of office as first president of the United States was used at the corner stone laying of the memorial arch in this city. There is an interesting history concerning the preservation of this book. When the gathering took place at which Washington was to be sworn it was discovered that no Bible had been provided. One of the marshals of the day was Jacob Morton, a gallant officer of the revolution. He was a Mason and master of St. John lodge, whose place of meeting was near by.

Every Masonic lodge is required by its charter to have a Bible within its walls, and Marshal Morton ran around the corner, found the janitor, secured the key to the lodge room and brought the book to Chancellor Robert R. Livingston, who was grand master of Masons of New York at that time, and who administered the oath to Washington. St. John lodge is still in existence, and has preserved the Bible as its greatest treasure. It lies open always in the lodge at the page whereon Washington rested his hand as he solemnly swore to protect the liberties of the country.—New York Press.

A Violin That Cost $10,000.

Ten thousand dollars is now the highest recorded price for a violin. The Alard Stradivarius has passed from France to England for that sum, to go into the collection of a Scotchman. It is dated 1716. It is described in the catalogue of the South Kensington exhibition of 1872 as the only one in a condition of perfect preservation. It was bought in 1760 by an Italian amateur, Count Cozio di Salabue, after whose death it was purchased in 1824 by a famous collector, Luigi Tarisio. Tarisio hid it away, refusing to let any one see it, till his death in 1854. A year later it was purchased by Vuillaume. Its condition of preservation led to the belief that it had scarcely been played upon during the whole 150 years of its existence. Vuillaume left it on his death to his son-in-law, Alard, who has just sold it.—Chicago Herald.

WIND SWEPT HEADS.

A Physician's Scheme for Detecting Insanity.

PLENTY OF AIR NEEDED FOR THE BRAIN.

A Wonderful Instrument That Will Tell When a "Screw is Loose."

Dr. Peter McCahey, of Philadelphia, has found that by placing a stethoscope to a person's head he can distinctly hear the sound of an air current within, and by the character of the sound can tell whether a person is sane or insane; and he positively avers that in the cranium of a big headed idiot this wind current can be distinctly heard loudly whistling.

The doctor is convinced that the brain breathes as well as the lungs. For many years he has been investigating air as a mechanical agent in the human body, and about a year ago conceived the novel idea of a rubber tip to the ordinary stethoscope, whereby the instrument can be fitted so exactly to the subject's head that the sound of this brain respiration cannot escape, but may be undeniably heard. That it differs in sane and insane persons the doctor is convinced, and by means of the stethoscope he feels sure that he can distinguish, as a rule, between healthy brained people and those who are insane or idiots.

The little rubber tip, which is Dr. McCahey's discovery, is a novelty, and its story was unfolded by Dr. McCahey himself.

"My general theory," declared Dr. McCahey, "is that the great mechanical agent employed by all the animate world, animal or vegetable, to permit of growth against the continual resistance of the atmosphere is heated air. Within the interstices of the tissue of the body is air, and this air, becoming heated by the processes of life, exercises a greater expansive force than the outer atmosphere, and thereby enables the animal to grow against it. You can squeeze this air out of tomato and pepper under water and see it come up in large bubbles. In the tissue and hollow organs of men this air is used as the direct mechanical function. The expulsive force in spitting, coughing and sneezing we know to be air.

"A free supply of air to the brain is just as necessary as a free supply to the lungs, and any interference with this brain respiration will cause serious disturbance of the cerebral functions, even insanity. Insanity may be caused by a tumor or by a congestive blow, but post mortems almost invariably disclose no resident cause of insanity. That people become insane and are permanently restored and that there is a recurrent insanity points to a functional derangement.

"This disturbed function I claim to be the cranial respiration. Air taken into the lungs passes to and from the brain through minute pores at the base of the skull. The normal circulation of blood through the brain depends upon this normal air current. If from any cause these tiny pores become closed or stopped to an abnormal degree, the current is impeded or destroyed. The air that is shut in becomes overheated and congests the brain."

By means of the doctor's rubber tipped stethoscope wonderful things come to light. In the head of a healthy person two distinct sounds can be heard, coincident with the inhalation and exhalation of air by the lungs. These sounds are practically of the same tone in all healthy heads, but are altered or absent in all classes of insane or idiots. The sounds of the heart and voice in these mentally weak and deranged unfortunates are also different from those in sane persons. As these are grades of insanity so there are degrees of sound.

As a rule the noise of the wind current of an insane or idiotic brain is more markedly perceptible than that of a sane organ, and in big headed idiots it whistles loudly. The major portion of insanity is caused by derangement of the cranial wind apparatus. Where it is not due to a tumor, a blow or some kindred direct injury to the brain or its covering, insanity is traceable to this "ill wind," and the rubber tipped stethoscope may yet become the champion insane expert in the world.—Newark Journal.

Greek Stories.

The controversy on "Compulsory Greek" in the universities has received a characteristic contribution from Mr. Labouchere, who says: "Once the late Mr. Peter Rylands hazarded a long Latin quotation in the house. I got up after him, when I said, 'My honorable friend evidently knows dead languages; I will therefore reply to his arguments in Greek—a language, no doubt, familiar to him.' Then I recited about the only line in the 'Iliad' that I knew. No one (Mr. Gladstone was absent) liked to admit that he did not understand my Greek, and consequently accepted the fact that I had replied conclusively to Mr. Rylands' arguments. So much for the knowledge of the dead languages possessed by the members of the august assembly at Westminster.

Mr. Labouchere was about as audacious and unscrupulous as that Welsh preacher who settled down among a congregation in a small town in the western states. A stranger dropping in to the meeting house one Sunday heard this ingenious preacher giving string after string of "the original Greek" of the pure passages bearing on his subject, all in pure and sonorous Welsh. The stranger, being a Welshman, was visibly amused, whereupon the preacher addressed him directly in Welsh, saying, "Don't give me away. They think its Greek, and its just as good for them."—Yorkshire Post.

The Silk Threads Not Always Sure.

It is a mistake to suppose that the presence of two threads in paper money is absolute evidence of genuineness, for while it is practically impossible for counterfeiters to get hold of paper with the threads running through it, it is quite common for them to split open paper, insert threads and then join the sections together again. An expert can easily find traces of this process, but it is done so neatly that the average eye is easily deceived. An experienced bank teller can feel the difference between paper which has been split and rejoined, and he can also detect a little roughness at the edges. For all that a split note is occasionally passed among others, and a man not accustomed to handling much paper money will take it without question.—Interview in St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Not Hard to Fit.

Mrs. De Style (hesitatingly)—Do you think you could wear them?

New Girl—Oh, yes, mum. After new shoes is wet they shrinks.

How to Trim a Hat.

For trimming hats the velvet or silk rosettes are much in vogue. They are easily made—after one knows how. You must conclude how large a rosette you want, and widen or narrow your material to suit the size. The rosette most fancied is just about the size of a rose, and the material, cut on the bias, is folded to be an inch wide. The strip is then gathered and drawn into shape, it being fastened in that way on a circle of stiff net. Sew it securely and do not attempt to plait it to shape—it must be gathered. One, two or three rosettes are used, and the number usually decides the size. An eighth of a yard of velvet, cut on the bias, will make one medium sized rosette, and this seems to be that best liked. Amateurs usually err in over trimming a hat or a bonnet; so, as straw ones are not so troublesome to arrange as those of velvet, do not commit this fault. If you cannot see the really good styles in any other way, then look at them in the milliner's window. Read her art, and marking it, learn and outwardly imitate. Chapeaux "just tossed" together always look what they are, and the one to which proper consideration and time has been shown is the one that approaches the nearest to being "a love of a bonnet."—Ladies' Home Journal.

How to Keep Your Bodice in Good Shape.

Blouses may come and go. Coat basques may have the same experience, but the trim, well fitting postilion basque is always in good form if it fits well. A basque that fits well is one that is not too tight to permit easy movement of the arms, and is one that does not need to be closed with a shoe buttoner. The wise woman who wants to keep her basque in good shape puts on her bonnet before she assumes it. Then, before any fastening begins, the inside belt should be drawn together, and it isn't the best thing to have the belt very tight, for that does not make the basque fit closer and does make the drawing of it together more difficult. By the by, no matter how you may be tempted to put large buttons on your bodice, remember that only small ones are considered good form. There must be a great many of these, so that the possibility of the opening standing apart even an inch between them does not exist. You think people don't have such ill fitting basques? Just wait till the next time you get into a street car and be satisfied that this is the truth.—Detroit Journal.

Clean Beds in the Sick Room.

In all cases attended with fever and increased heat of the system a mattress is preferable to down or feather beds, and neither in health nor sickness should such beds be used of a too soft or yielding nature. A bed moderately elastic, but which does not yield to the body so as to become hollow and depressed, is the best. Smooth cotton sheets are at all times preferable to linen, and they should be frequently changed. In febrile diseases, and in hot weather especially, two beds are highly grateful to the patient, one being cooled and aired while the other is occupied. These beds may be either in the same or adjoining rooms; a sofa may suit very well for one of the temporary changes. Where the patient is confined to one bed an agreeable way of airing it is occasionally to lift up the bed clothes by grasping them in the middle, raising them gently, so that the air may enter at the sides without uncovering the patient, and then letting them down and forcing out all the heated air. This process may be once or twice repeated.—New York Ledger.

Yeast for House Plants.

"Tell me, please, what spell you cast about your plants that they flourish so vigorously?" I asked a lady friend as I examined the lovely blooms which seemed to have fairly captured the big bay window. One miniature tree of heliotrope flooded the room with its sweet perfume. "Now, this plant," she said, "is considered by some extremely fragile, but it in reality only requires plenty of sun and water to grow most luxuriantly. They are thirsty things and are too often allowed to die for want of sufficient moisture. An English recipe has, however, furnished me with the secret by which I may enjoy all the season through a succession of lovely blossoms. Delicate plants I water occasionally with yeast. This seems to strengthen them in a wonderful manner. Then I have found that seeds which absolutely refuse to sprout in the ground may be coaxed into a vigorous existence by giving them a bath of camphor and water, putting them in the sun and letting them remain until they burst, when they are placed in the earth."—Philadelphia Inquirer.

Woman and Her Parasol.

During the warm months, when they carry sunshades, women have a special way of being reckless. They will plunge right into the midst of a crowded street, holding their parasols close over their heads, seeming wholly to forget how it shuts off their view and endangers the safety of their transit. One day on Broadway, but for the timely interference of a man who was crossing, a woman would have been trampled under the feet of a cart horse, simply because she was trying to get across with her parasol tilted carelessly over her shoulder at an angle that entirely shut off her upper view of the street. And because she could not see it she seemed as serenely unconscious as an ostrich that all the street there was not immediately to the front and left of her. Even at the risk of getting a little heated in crossing the street in the glare of the sun it would be wise for every woman to close her parasol when she comes to a place where she must risk her life.—New York Evening Sun.

A lady asks how to make coffee jelly. The following recipe is said to be excellent: Soak one-half box of gelatine in one-half cupful of cold water. Make a quart of strong, clear coffee and strain it. Sweeten to taste with white sugar, making it a little sweeter than would be desired if the coffee were to drink. Set it on the fire until it is boiling hot, then pour it at once on the gelatine. Put into wet molds to stiffen; then turn out. This is nice served with ice cream or with cream alone.—Boston Herald.

Muslin should be washed in a lather of cold water. Never put it into warm water, even to rinse it. If the muslin should be green add a wineglass of vinegar to the water in which it is rinsed; if lilac, the same quantity of ammonia. For black and white muslins use a small allowance of sugar of lead.

The will of Maria M. Honsington, filed in the probate office, Springfield, Mass., bequeaths $1,000 to the American board, $1,000 to the New West Educational commission, $500 to the Woman's board, $500 to the American Missionary association and $500 to the Missionary society.

Silver link purses for ladies' use are now made long, with an opening in the center to close with rings, like the netted silk purses.

PRAISING EUGENIE.

The Empress' Rightful Place in History Described.

EXTRACTS FROM A NEWSPAPER STORY.

A Much Abused Woman.—Her Opinion of the Franco-Prussian War.

An anonymous writer in the Paris Figaro has created a sensation by the publication of documents which throw a new light on the conduct and character of Empress Eugenie. His story reads like a novel. The writer says:

"It is not a defense that I am undertaking, the empress would forgive no friend for that; it is not a biography, for a whole book would hardly suffice to tell the story of a life so full of bewildering contrasts. I wish simply by facts to destroy an iniquitous legend which tends to distort our history and rests solely upon falsehood and dishonesty.

"During the past few years there has been published almost everywhere a series of books, pamphlets and articles calculated to mislead the public opinion. People have discussed even the most trivial acts of a sovereign whose misfortunes should be a barrier against injustice. They have scrutinized her life, her projects, her thoughts, and even her inconsolable griefs. And they have invented and linked with her name vulgar fables which have been adopted alike by persons who have involuntarily forgotten the past and by those who have never known anything of it.

"It is for the friends of old, to whom she was so kind and generous in happier days, to protest against this overflow of insults. I therefore ask permission to raise my feeble voice to establish some impartial truths. The empress herself may perhaps be inclined to blame me for reviving the past that is buried for her and dear ones gone forever; but I am certain to have with me all those who remember her, including the thousands of mothers whose children in the days of splendor were the godsons of the sovereign lady who was once beloved and applauded by all France.

"I will not recall the different visits to Paris of the Countess de Teba with her mother, the Countess de Montijo, but I must refer to a detail imperfectly understood and often exploited against her. Certainly the Countess de Teba was highly flattered, honored and happy the day when the emperor asked her to share his destiny; but, superstitious and timid, she was frightened at the very excess of her good fortune. She considered the difficulties and the burden of her sudden elevation and the loss of that independence which up to that moment was assured to her by her rank, her birth and her fortune, and, filled with gratitude, loyally and honestly sought to dissuade the emperor from his project.

"But the emperor firmly persisted in his resolution. As he declared to the corps legislatif when he announced his marriage, he expected to find in her 'a wife pious, gracious and good, who would be an ornament to the throne and its most courageous supporter in the days of danger.' By the nobleness of her attitude, by her tact and the great purity of her life, Eugenie won the sympathy and the respect of all Europe."

After detailing some of the numerous acts of charity of the empress, her weekly visits incognito to the slums of Paris, where more than 500 families received assistance from her generous hand in utter ignorance of the name of their benefactress, the writer comes down to the annee terrible.

"The phrase 'this is my war,' attributed to the empress, has been repeatedly and widely published everywhere. Nothing could be more false. The empress desired peace. The emperor and his government endeavored sincerely to avoid a conflagration, but since 1866 the opposition represented France as humiliated by Prussia and conquered at Sadowa, and the public opinion was in favor of France taking up the gauntlet. The cry was for war, and it was uttered with a tumultuous energy that nobody forgets. If the promoters of this movement have, since our reverses, declined all responsibility for their attitude in order to throw the blame upon the empress, history will have no such partiality.

"Moreover, the newspapers of all shades published in 1870 and the official reports of the debates in the corps legislatif establish beyond contradiction the fact that the population of Paris wanted war. The feverish exaltation in the midst of which our regiments left the capital was such that when the emperor decided to go with his army, he avoided passing through Paris. A historian, who has certainly never been overindulgent to the empire, M. Rotham, admits that if the empress was the victim of those warlike passions, she never showed them.

"She anxiously asked M. de Parieu what he thought of the resolution taken. 'I think, madam,' said the president of the state council, 'that if tomorrow England could find a formula that would permit us to avoid this war, she would do a great service to France.' The empress replied, 'That is precisely my opinion.'

"But what was the attitude of the empress regent when the news came of our first disaster? A man known for his attachment to other princes, General Chabaud-Latour, gives this testimony: 'On the night of the 7th to the 8th of August we had just heard of Forbach and Reischoffen. I was called to the empress with the ministers. Nothing could be more noble or dignified than her language at that hour: "We are now looking after the preservation of the empire," she said; "we must see to the safety of France."' Here is Trochu's testimony: 'The empress has displayed coolness, character and courage, sentiments far more French than imperialistic. I wish to do her this justice.'"

"When it was proposed to re-enforce the army of MacMahon shortly before Sedan, the empress was told that the 22,000 men under General Vinoy constituted the guard of Paris, and that if they were to leave the capital might be at the mercy of demagogues. Her reply, faithfully reported by M. Henri Chevreau, was as follows: 'Let me entreat you now, once and for all, not to think of me. Think of the army, think of France. I will hear no discussion of the question. Don't lose a moment. Let General Vinoy leave this very day!'"

The rest of the story is like some romance, with Eugenie as its unfortunate heroine. It portrays a singularly beautiful character, and every assertion appears to be well fortified. Eugenie's last days at the Tuileries are described with dramatic power, and all her griefs are referred to with touching effect.

The American railroad king though uncrowned, has all the honor, more than all the profit, and none of the cares and anxieties that pertain to royalty in Europe. Our monarch when he travels is surrounded by all the luxuries that boundless wealth can inspire inventive genius to produce. He is attended by courtiers as obedient to his will as any potentate who ever sat upon a throne. His coming and going are described in the newspapers with all the minuteness and apparent delight European papers take in describing the travels of their royal rulers. If he looks pleased, the fact is given as a fact of national importance, and if he frowns or looks in ill humor, an awful dread appears to fall upon the worshipers of this great man, and wide-spread disaster is augured from his displeasure. The wishes of the European monarch may be crossed and his plans thwarted by some independent soul in a legislative assembly, but an American king is never troubled in that way. When a Trumbull or a Thurman appears in Congress to trouble our king, he is quickly retired to private life. When the European monarch asks for more money there may be bitter opposition to the appropriation bills, and the amounts may be greatly reduced. But when our king wants more money—and the want is insatiable—he simply orders an increase of freight and fare rates, and we must submit. His will is supreme. During the past twenty years despotic authority has made more solid gain in the United States than it has made in any other country in the world in twenty centuries. Every Federal office, from village Postmaster to President is controlled by our uncrowned king. Every Federal Judge, from the District Courts to the Supreme Court of the United States, is appointed through the influence of the same power. There is not a Legislature in the United States but our railroad kings control, and in both houses of Congress they have a majority of able servants eager to carry out their will. By control of all the avenues to wealth our kings are accumulating such vast riches as never before were possessed on earth. Year by year more and more of the profits of all industries are coming into their possession. Mortgages and all and all kinds of incumbrances upon the property of farmers are increasing steadily. As a necessary consequence poverty and all its attendant evils for the great majority is increasing even more rapidly than the wealth of the few. Vice and crime, as shown by statistics, are increasing in a far greater proportion than population. Such a condition if continued long enough would destroy the life of the nation. Esau being a hunter must have been a brave man and used to a free life; but hunger debased him to sell his birthright for something to eat. But among Americans there will never be wanting brave souls to defy the power of plutocrats, despise their vile tools and incite their countrymen to struggle for freedom. The spirit of Patrick Henry never dies. The railroads, telegraph lines and other great public concerns of right belong to the whole people, and when they take possession of their own much of the corruption that now debases every branch of government will cease.

The best element of the Republican party strongly denounces the late Stockton convention. The San Francisco Bulletin always a staunch party paper says: "It is found that the railroad was running the convention. Its handiwork was quite perceptible in the platform. There is one subject above all others which now engages the attention of almost every man in the State; that is to say, the best method of relieving California from the railroad monopoly which is slowly eating out its vitals. But the convention had not a word in its platform to say on that question. Clearly, it was deaf as a post on that side of its head. It was not in favor of free coinage of silver until it could be ordered with safety. There was a demand for bread on the part of the people, but it was only a stone that was tendered. But that it has done the party no good in the local sense every intelligent man in California well knows. No very high hopes were entertained in relation to it when the manner in which it had been embodied was taken into consideration. Not more than 10 per cent, if that many, of the Republicans of the State had any real part in the election of its delegates. More than one-half of them were appointed by antiquated committees chosen two years ago. A large part of the remainder was thrown up in primary elections by fraud and violence. It is said that blessed are they who expect nothing, for they shall not be disappointed. But evidently the Republican party cannot be run indefinitely in these grooves. It will have to purge itself of the Bosses and schemers who have found a lodgment within its lines."

The Call is another staunch Republican paper, and it says: "The whole State and people are made poorer every day, and this is done under the pretense of law. We pretend to have a city and State government. We claim to elect members of the Legislature, Railroad Commissioners and Judges, but what are the facts? For some years past men connected with the railroad companies have assumed to be exceedingly liberal with political parties, which is undoubtedly correct. Prior to the assembly of a convention the agents of the railroad are busy in securing delegates, and such delegates as will answer their purpose. It is not a crime, it is said to expend money to elect delegates to a convention who will do what a few men wish them to do; but suppose such members of the Legislature are nominated as will do precisely what the railroad managers wish them to do, where is the difference in effect upon the public whether these members of the Legislature are purchased before or after election? To purchase them after election is termed bribery, but to expend money to secure the nomination of the agents of the railroads before the election is said simply to be a creditable act. Most of our officials, in the opinion of most persons, are selected in the way indicated. Indeed, the public have not had much to do in the selection of their Judges, Railroad Commissioners or members of the Legislature. Affairs have reached such a pass, that in the opinion of most persons, it is scarcely worth while to institute a suit at law against the powerful corporation to which reference is made, with the expectation of obtaining substantial justice."

Coming from the most respectable Republican papers in the State, such strong condemnation as this will surely open the eyes of men to the manner which the party is run and the uses corrupt men are making of it.

How It Is Done in China.

Though the Chinese diplomatist moves slowly, there are some Chinese mandarins whose ways are expeditious and summary. Under the auspices of Chang Chih-tung foreign engineers are prospecting in the neighborhood of Hankow. They were commended the other day by the viceroy to the care and protection of a minor mandarin. This personage, rooted in the traditions of the past, viewed the advent of the "Fanqui" with disapproval.

He penned a remonstrance, setting forth that it would be unsafe to allow the earth dragon, who has lain undisturbed since the time of Confucius, to be profanely tampered with. The country folk, he explained, were a rough set, who, on seeing strange men with strange instruments in their hands probing and peering into the earth, would be sure to be roused to mischief, and as he professed himself powerless to restrain the riot that might ensue, he prayed his excellency to reconsider the matter.

The viceroy took in the situation at a glance. He wrote in reply to say that, inasmuch as the local official did not seem equal to cope with the situation, he was sending five deputies, with boats and followers, to afford the foreigners safe and suitable escort—all at the expense of the remonstrant. Their visit is said to have cost the worthy magistrate some £750, and since then Chang Chih-tung has not been troubled with any more remonstrance from the zealous defender of the earth dragon.—Manchester (England) Examiner.

The Dog Didn't Like His Snore.

In hunting for evidence of a dog fight Sunday the officers learned that one Herbert Sprague, a stevedore, had been bitten by a canine. Investigation shows that Sprague went to bed Saturday night with a bull pup. Sprague snored, and this disturbed the dog, so he scratched his owner's face to wake him. Sprague retaliated by cufling the canine, whereupon the bull fastened his teeth in the man's nose and then shook him, sadly lacerating the member. Sprague finally broke the hold, disabled the dog with a chair and then got a neighbor to shoot him. The nose will recover, but looks bad.—Bangor Cor. Lewiston Journal.

The Congressional Funeral.

On the recent congressional trip to Chicago from Washington, a young man accustomed to hilarity began to weary of the staid decorum of the excursionists and to long for something wild and woolly.

"Is it?" said the congressman, with a significant smile; "well, I guess you don't know much about one of our funeral trains."—Detroit Free Press.

How Banks Treat "Sweated" Coins.

In a recent deposit in the United States subtreasury in this city by a New York bank of more than $100,000 in gold received from California seven "sweated" coins were found. They were placed on a block and the letter L punched on their face to show that they were light weight and then returned to the bank.—New York Herald.

Tennyson's Indignation.

Lord Tennyson is said to be greatly angered at the book in which Mr. Charton Collins seems, at any rate, to bring against him a charge of plagiarism. This is a charge which has always had the most irritating effect upon the poet, and most people will probably agree that a book like Mr. Collins' is probably best postponed until the author with whose work it deals is beyond the feeling of resentment. We are confident that the greater number of the critics who today deal so cavalierly with Virgil, Homer, Horace and the other great immortals, would abstain if their victims were still in the land of the living.

And in this case the matter is made worse by the fact that Lord Tennyson has been at special pains to show his feelings in regard to any charges of the kind. "These writers," he said to a friend, on the occasion when he was last made the subject of this charge, "these writers are the lice on the locks of literature," showing that even in his wrath a poet does not forget to use "alliteration's artful aid."

Nor is this anger remarkable when it is remembered on what passages the would be accuser fixed in order to prove the truth of his indictment. Poor Tennyson was not allowed to say "Ring the bells" without being accused of having borrowed from Sir Philip Sidney, or to apply to the ocean the verb "roar" without being told that he had plaigarized from Homer! And when he described a waterfall in the well known line, "Slow dropping veils of thinnest lawn," he was immediately charged by a critic with having borrowed the metaphor from the lawn used in theaters to imitate a waterfall! Imagine the feelings of a faithful artist who had studied the effect before a waterfall in the Pyrenees!—Bookman.

The Widow Watson's Wooing.

Leap year has been inaugurated in the town of Egerton, Kan., by a well to do widow who took a liking to a young farm hand employed in the neighborhood. Mrs. Mary Watson owns a fine farm, and she has been recognized as a strongminded woman. Her husband died about five years ago and left her about $20,000.

About a week ago she came to town to market and met John Northrup, who works on a farm about two miles beyond the farm of Mrs. Watson. Mrs. Watson had never seen the young man before, but appeared to be much taken with his appearance, and asked to be made acquainted with him.

The young man was not astonished at the request, but was much surprised when she told him, after knowing him about half an hour, that she wanted a husband and if he was willing she thought they would do well together as man and wife. He was a little taken aback at the suddenness of the offer, but he concluded he could do no better and accepted without any shyness. They got the necessary license and were made man and wife.—Cor. Philadelphia Press.

The Dates of Easter.

It has been over 1,500 years since the rule was adopted which makes Easter the first Sunday after the first full moon after the sun crosses the line. By this arrangement of things Easter may come as early as March 22 or as late as April 25. I have compiled the following facts concerning the days of the month upon which it has fallen from 1893 to 1891, inclusive. In looking over the dates I have been struck by the variety of days represented, which include every one in the month of April except the last five.

Since 1893 it has occurred three times on the 19th, five times on the 16th, five times on the 1st, four times each on the 2d, 11th and 12th, four times on March 31, four times on April 6, three times on the 4th, 5th, 7th, 8th, 10th, 13th, 14th and 22d of April, and 27th and 28th of March. March 22, 1818, was the earliest date upon which it has occurred. Nine days in March are represented, viz., 22d, 23d, 25th, 26th, 27th, 28th, 29th, 30th and 31st.—St. Louis Republic.

Cheap Telephones.

The natural inquiry arises what will telephones cost when their manufacture is free, and what will be the expense of equipping a private line? It is scarcely necessary to go into detailed estimates at this juncture, especially as the cost must necessarily vary with the conditions, such as the class of work required, the finish of the instrument and so on. A telephone that will speak can be made for very little, and small instruments for household work need cost no more than electric bells of the same quality and finish.

Some years ago I put in a large hotel in Spain an installation of electric bells and telephones; the telephones were in the form of ordinary push buttons; you pressed the button and then pulled the wooden case from the clamp which held it to the base fixed to the wall and spoke into the back of the push, which contained a telephone of the ordinary pattern with a very short magnet. The cost of these instruments was very small. —Engineering Magazine.

Two Marvelous Escapes.

In the space of two minutes John Swanson, of Omaha, had two almost miraculous escapes from death. He was standing near a quarry when a keg of powder exploded and hurled him a considerable distance from the spot. In a senseless condition he landed just above a charge of dynamite, the fuse of which had already been lighted. Before he could be rescued the dynamite exploded, and Swanson was blown a second time into the air. Notwithstanding this double accident the man escaped with only a broken leg and arm.—Yankee Blade.

"Everybody's" Idea.

First Boy—Why does everybody look so glum?

Second Boy—'Cause there ain't goin to be no war.

First Boy—Did everybody want to go to war?

Second Boy—No; everybody wanted to stay home an make money while the war was goin on.—Good News.

When Taking Down the Stove.

An acre planted with sunflowers yields 2,000 pounds of seeds, from which 250 pounds of oil may be obtained. Ten million quarts of this oil is produced by Russian mills annually.

A Japanese Society.

There are so many English people who have visited Japan or who have fallen in love with it from reading the eulogies penned by Sir Edwin Arnold, Mr. Norman and others, that the society which is in course of formation for "the encouragement of the study of Japanese art, science and industries, of the commerce and finance, the social life, the literature, the language, history and folklore of the Japanese," ought to be a success. Certainly the programme does not lack comprehensiveness, for almost any one of the subjects enumerated would be sufficient to keep an ordinary society going.

The organizing council contains several names closely associated with the country, such as Mr. Ernest Satow, Professor W. Anderson and Professor Church, as well as those of leading Japanese residents in England. Very suitably, the headquarters of the society are to be at the Japanese consulates in London, Liverpool and Glasgow, for no people are more anxious to spread a knowledge of Japan abroad than the Japanese government.—London Chronicle.

A Bad Place to Be Ill.

It is one thing to have the grip in town or anywhere on the mainland within reach of a doctor, and another think to be stricken with the disease on a remote isle of the sea. On a Thursday morning recently the inhabitants of Grand Manan, a large, well populated island off the Maine coast, observed a single fire—the sick signal—burning on Three Isles, six miles seaward, but as a gale was blowing and the sea running high nobody could land there. On Sunday evening a physician, accompanied by three sturdy oarsmen in a dory, reached the isles in a blinding snowstorm. Fifteen of the sixteen inhabitants were sick abed, leaving one man barely able to crawl to the headland and keep the signal burning. It was three days before weather moderated sufficiently to allow the relief party to return home, and in that time the sick were relieved.—New York Sun.

Lightning Spared the Pious Pair.

During a heavy rain lightning struck the parsonage of the Methodist Episcopal church, a nice four room cottage, completely demolishing the building with the exception of the east room, in which were sitting the pastor, the Rev. Jerome Haralson, and his wife. That they were not instantly killed everybody pronounces a miracle, for everything in their room all around them was broken in small pieces. A more complete wreck was never seen. There is not a whole nail or piece of timber in the building except in the little room they occupied. Not only the building was wrecked, but the fence around it was torn down. The shock broke a considerable amount of crockery for those living in the neighborhood of the parsonage.—Haskell Cor. District Attorney Forbes went to Big Pine on business last Tuesday.

Judge Morrow won the Brooklyn handicap. Russell second, time 2:08¾.

A car-load of ore from the Hirsch mine was shipped to Selby & Co. last Saturday.

Mr. and Mrs. A. C. Harvey of Lone Pine visited Independence early in the week.

Mrs. Sallie M. Bell of Big Pine visited Independence during the week, going to Lone Pine on Wednesday.

G. P. Rixford, President of the Inyo Marble Company, went south on Wednesday's train to visit the quarry.

Emmons Spencer Esq., the Big Pine legal light, loomed up in town last Monday evening with 1000 candle power.

F. H. Austin was in town on Wednesday. He says the prospects are excellent for the completion of the Lone Pine Canal.

C. A. Walter has been marketing some fine strawberries during the week. The berries are smaller than usual but of superior flavor.

W. H. Huff will reopen a barber shop in the building belonging to A. J. Davis on Market Street. He expects to be ready for business to-morrow.

Farmers and those needing good, serviceable work harness should call and see the new line of goods just received by A. W. Eibeshutz.

Mrs. F. Rhine, accompanied by her daughters, arrived at Independence on Wednesday. They expect to remain for the summer months.

Constable Murphy had a plethora of legal business this week. He made a trip through the lower end of the county early in the week and went to Big Pine on Tuesday.

The railroad agent at Independence Station states that freight rates from San Francisco, Stockton and Sacramento to Independence have been reduced to $2.50 per 100 pounds.

A. N. Bell of the Oak Creek Mills returned on Wednesday from a visit to relatives at Stockton. He reports having had a most enjoyable trip and certainly looks much improved in health.

W. K. Miller of the Mojave & Keeler stage line was in town last Tuesday. He is putting a lot of new stock on the line and will run four-horse stages clear through. While here he bought a fine span of horses of O. I. Mairs.

Hon. Evan Williams, of Ormsby, the Nevada member of the Republican national committee, has publicly declared since his return from San Francisco that the silver men must make common cause against the gold men if they expect to win.

A party consisting of Mr. and Mrs. H. M. Yerington, Mr. and Mrs. Judge Belknap and Ed. Yerington, went south to Keeler in a special last Thursday. At this place Mr. Laws joined the party. They returned Sunday and proceeded to Carson. —Bulletin.

In the announcement column will be found the card of George F. Willis as a candidate for County Clerk. Mr. Willis is well qualified to fill the position to which he aspires and is a capable, industrious young man. He has been secretary of the Republican Central Committee for the past two years and his claims upon the party should meet with due recognition.

A traveling man who chanced to be in the store of E. V. Wood, at McKees Rocks Pa., says while he was waiting to see Mr. Wood, a little girl came in with an empty bottle labeled Chamberlain's Pain Balm and said: "Mamma wants another bottle of that medicine; she says it is the best medicine for rheumatism she ever used." 50 cent bottles for sale by

Mr. J. P. Blaize, an extensive real estate dealer in Des Moines, Iowa, narrowly escaped one of the severest attacks of pneumonia while in the northern part of that State during a recent blizzard, says the Saturday Review. Mr. Blaise had occasion to drive several miles during the storm and was so thoroughly chilled that he was unable to get warm, and inside of an hour after his return he was threatened with a severe case of pneumonia or lung fever. Mr. Blaize sent to the nearest drug store and got a bottle of Chamberlain's Cough Remedy, of which he had often heard, and took a number of large doses. He says the effect was wonderful and that in a short time he was breathing quite easily. He kept on taking the medicine and in a few days was able to come to Des Moines. Mr. Blaize regards his cure as simply wonderful. 50 cent bottles for sale by

SUPERVISORS' PROCEEDINGS.

WEDNESDAY, May 19, 1892.

On the above named day the Board of Supervisors of Inyo county, State of California met in special session pursuant to call made May 9th, 1892. Present, Supervisors Love, Watterson and Stewart, Chairman Stewart presiding. Absent, Supervisor Fitzgerald. The Board adjourned to meet Thursday, May 19th, at 10 o'clock a. m.

THURSDAY, May 19, 1892.

The Board of Supervisors of Inyo county, State of California, met at 10 o'clock a. m., pursuant to adjournment. Present, Supervisors, Love, Watterson and Stewart, Chairman Stewart presiding. Absent, Supervisor Fitzgerald.

The notice calling the special meeting was read by the Clerk, the said call and meeting being for the purpose "to do and perform all necessary acts in calling of a special election in Supervisor District No. 3 to fill a vacancy caused by the death of J. B. Steward." Upon due consideration the following motion was made by Supervisor Watterson, seconded by Supervisor Love and carried by the Board: "That in view of the doubt existing as to the mode of holding special elections on account of change in the election and registration laws that we do not order said special election but leave the vacancy to be filled by appointment of Governor, or until next general election. There being no further business before the Board the claims of the members for per diem and mileage were allowed and the Board adjourned.

The Supervisor Muddle.

The question of selecting a Supervisor to fill the vacancy caused by the death of J. B. Steward causes considerable of a muddle. A special meeting of the Board of Supervisors was held during the week for the purpose of ordering a special election and after debating the subject at considerable length they adjourned without doing so. The law is very definite upon the point that a special election shall be called when the vacancy does not occur within ninety days of a general election, and the Governor only has power to appoint in that event. Consequently should the Governor appoint a Supervisor for this district his acts would not be legal. The Attorney-General gives it as his opinion that every Great Register in the State is cancelled, consequently an election cannot be had. Again, it will not be just to leave the Third District without representation through four meetings of the Board. Will some one kindly come forward with a solution to this puzzle? From present indication a Philadelphia lawyer would not be in it.

Look Out For It.

Now that thousands of sheep are coming through the Valley from a region infested with foxtail we again take occasion to warn the farmers to be on their guard against this weed. Too much care cannot be exercised to prevent its obtaining a foothold here. It is a well known fact that sheep will carry seeds in their wool for hundreds of miles; and if further proof is needed this fact will bear it out: Mr. Hunter discovered quite a patch of foxtail on his ranch at Georges Creek on a spot where a band of sheep had camped. This he very promptly uprooted and burned and he now keeps a vigilant outlook for any further growth. To any person who has seen entire fields of hay burned on the ground in the infested region about Bakersfield this warning will be well understood. The only way to prevent foxtail from effecting a lodgment here is by maintaining a constant watch and promptly digging up and burning every spear of it as soon as it makes its appearance.

Defines His Position.

The editor of the Index, Mr. Craig, places himself squarely before the people on the railroad question. He openly and avowedly admits that he is in the pay of the C. & C. railroad. He claims that it was through his instrumentality, and upon his advice that the recent reduction in the freight rate was made, and that it was done with the sole object in view of compelling the team owned by Kinsley & Mead to stop hauling. He was asked, "Will not the railroad company raise the rates to the old standard when the team quits?" He replied, "Of course they will, it's a business proposition." To the question, "How will that benefit the people of Owens Valley?" He replied, "The people be damned. I'm like Vanderbilt." This charming frankness will be deeply appreciated by the people of Inyo county.

Lone Pine News.

Saturday last Lone Piners were treated to two pic-nics—ice-cream and cake in one end of town and a barbecue in the other, followed by a dance in the evening. Who says Lone Pine isn't lively?

Mrs. P. H. Mack and Mrs. Irv. H. Mulholland of Independence were among the visitors at the pic-nic.

It is said that the sum of $40 was taken in by the Ladies' Aid Society.

Aaron Berliner, who was at Denver, Colorado, for the last four months, is very sick at San Francisco.

There has been a change in our local meat market. Messrs. Labarge and Meyers are now in charge.

The run of ore at the Lasky mill was completed on Friday last.

Miss Clara Reynolds of Georges Creek has been visiting in town for the past few days.

Mr. and Mrs. Relles Carrasco came up from Keeler last Saturday on a visit.

The Ideal Baking Powder is
Dr. Price's Cream Baking Powder.

For more than fifty years Cream of Tartar and Bicarbonate of Soda have been used for leavening purposes with sufficient flour added to preserve the strength of the powder unimpaired, and this with the addition of whites of eggs comprises this pure and wholesome leavening agent, that has been the standard for 40 years. In its use pure, wholesome and delicious food is always assured.

Makes cake and biscuit that retain their moisture, and while they are flaky and extremely light they are fine grained, not coarse and full of holes as made with ammonia baking powders, latter dries up quickly. Alum powders leave a bitter taste in the bread or cake.

Dr. Price's Cream Baking Powder once used, always used.

What troubles the housekeeper is the thought that the minute the furnace stops eating up coal the refrigerator will begin eating up ice.

"German Syrup"

Justice of the Peace, George Wilkinson, of Lowville, Murray Co., Minn., makes a deposition concerning a severe cold. Listen to it. "In the Spring of 1888, through exposure I contracted a very severe cold that settled on my lungs. This was accompanied by excessive night sweats. One bottle of Boschee's German Syrup broke up the cold, night sweats, and all and left me in a good, healthy condition. I can give German Syrup my most earnest commendation." ①

ESCAPE FROM MASSACRE.

Our family, which consisted of father, mother, myself and sister, had been living in Minnesota nearly two years when the Indians initiated that murderous and historic uprising. I was 16 years old and my sister Mamie was 12. We were living on a 100 acre farm, six miles from any village and a mile from any neighbor. We had a snug log house, barns, sheds, etc., and about fifty acres in cultivation. Three days before the outbreak my father had marched away with a company of recruits for the army, and this same company had taken almost every able bodied man out of our neighborhood. The crops were to be left for the wives and children to harvest, and the idea of trouble never entered any one's mind. While Indians were more numerous than white people nobody had reason to fear them. They were under care of the government, and, so far as anybody knew, were perfectly satisfied, and entertained friendly feelings toward the settlers.

My father left home the day before the outbreak, and mother went along to see him off. This was the case with several other women in our settlement. They left early in the morning, intending to return next day. Sister and I were left entirely alone, but at about 9 o'clock in the forenoon an Indian named Long Walk made his appearance. He had often called at our house, sometimes staying all night. He had a bad sore on his leg, caused by the bite of a dog, and mother had made and given him an ointment which was fast healing it up. Father had mended his gun for him, mother had mended his clothes, and Long Walk was indebted to the family for many other kindnesses. He was a man of about 40, very intelligent, and, as near as we could learn, had never been married.

I was cutting hay about a quarter of a mile back of the house, and Mamie was spreading it to cure when the Indian appeared. He had been to the house and found father and mother gone. When he came down to us he queried:

"Where father?"

"Gone with the soldiers," I replied.

"Where mother?"

"She has gone to see father off."

He looked anxious and troubled, and when I asked if he would have something to eat he replied in the negative. He sat down in the shade of a tree and had nothing to say for a while. When I repeated my inquiry and Mamie offered to cook him some breakfast he rose and replied:

"Come along to cabin."

When we reached the house he took a long look up and down the road. It was sixteen miles to the railroad station from which the soldiers would depart, and Long Walk seemed to be wondering if he should advise us to set out for that point. After a time he seemed to think it wouldn't do, and turned and entered the house. Our cabin was a two roomed affair, with a garret above. There were two windows in each room below, but none above. Long Walk examined the windows, then went out to a pile of lumber in the yard and said:

"Get saw—get hammer—get nails—get boards and fix windows. Make everything good today."

"But why?" I naturally asked.

"Suppose bad Indian come to-morrow?" he queried in reply.

"But the Indians won't hurt us."

His manner more than his words made me feel that danger menaced us, and I got the tools he asked for and began work at once. He measured for the windows, and I sawed off some pieces of plank. He then asked for an auger, and before the pieces were nailed up we cut loopholes in them, two to each window. We then removed the sashes from the windows and nailed the planks on the inside. Long Walk examined the front door, which was the only one, and by his direction I reenforced it and added a second bar. When this had been done he asked:

"How much gun in the house?"

We had a rifle and a shotgun, together with a revolver, which belonged to a young man who had worked for us in the spring, and was then on a farm about ten miles away. I got these arms together, and Long Walk examined them with great care. We had two pounds of powder, a lot of shot and caps, and three or four bars of lead. He seemed to be satisfied, and then took me out doors and said:

"Bad Indian no come today, but come to-morrow. Get plenty of water in the house. Make rain on the roof. If bad Indian come shoot him."

"But I can't understand," I said. "Why should we be afraid of the Indians?"

"Indian heap mad—look out!" he replied, and with that he stalked away, and would not even turn his head when I called to him.

I don't believe I should have realized the full significance of his warning had not an older head come to my assistance. Mrs. Webster, our nearest neighbor, whose husband had also gone to be a soldier, but who had not gone with him to the station, came over at noon to borrow some flour. When I told her what had happened she was very much alarmed. She had heard whispered fears of an Indian outbreak, and she argued that Long Walk would not have done as he had if there was not imminent danger. She had no children, and was only a few minutes in deciding to remain with us until mother returned. I went to her house and got her double barreled shotgun and ammunition, as well as a bundle of clothes, and when I returned we began carrying out the instructions of the Indian. The spring was only a hundred feet from the house. I got on the roof, and water was passed up to me, and I flung it about until the slabs would soak in no more. A bonfire on the roof would scarcely have ignited them. We had two tubs and several jars. These we filled and carried into the house.

It was 4 o'clock in the afternoon when we were through. I had then molded over a hundred bullets for rifle and revolver, and we could think of nothing else to add to our security. What was a very unusual thing, we had seen no Indians that day except Long Walk. This as much as anything else satisfied Mrs. Webster that something unusual was on foot. About 5 o'clock she determined to go to her cabin to pack up and bring away some small articles, and she returned two hours later in a state of great agitation. She had caught sight of several Indians skulking about, and on the road had met a squaw who had spoken to her in an insulting manner and tried to take the bundle from her hand. It was not yet dark when we shut the house up and made ready for the awful tragedy which was to be played on the morrow.

I don't think Mrs. Webster closed her eyes that night, although nothing occurred to disturb us, and sister and I slept for many hours. It had been daylight for an hour when we awoke, and we were then aroused by the voice of Mrs. Webster saying:

"Children! children! the Indians are coming!"

While I was dressing I heard the yells and whoops of Indians about the house. There was a gang of about forty of them, and as soon as I looked out through a loophole I saw a great smoke from the direction of Mrs. Webster's house. Just as I was dressed there came a pounding on the door, and the voice of an Indian called out:

"Huh! Somebody in here! Open door, quick!"

"What do you want?" asked Mrs. Webster.

"Indian hungry—want food. Indian good friend with Mrs. Bliss."

I was watching the crowd at the door, and I saw that all were armed. Two or three were crouched ready to spring at the door the instant it was unbarred.

"Go away—you can't come in," replied Mrs. Webster.

"Indian want food."

"We have none for you."

"Indian want whisky."

"There is no whisky in the house."

"Then Indian want to talk."

"Well, what do you want?"

They had expected to take us by surprise, and the fact that they had not upset their calculations for a time. They retired a short distance to talk it over, and during this interval we made ready for what was coming. Making as little noise as possible, six Indians laid down their guns and picked up a piece of 4 by 4 scantling which father intended to use as one of the sills for a dairy house over the spring. They were approaching the door with this battering ram when I fired from the left hand window and Mrs. Webster from the right, both of us using shotguns. I fired at the men's legs and she at their heads. I had but one barrel, while she had two.

As all six went down I thought at first we had killed them all. Not so, however, though it was plain that all were hit. Two lay on the ground under the scantling, while the others got up to limp away. We had opened the battle, and got in the first knock down blow. For a moment the Indians were stupefied. Then they uttered their war whoop, and the fight was on.

I think I should have made a good fight of it without Mrs. Webster, as I had been brought up on the frontier and had the nerve of a man, but it was well that she was there. While she was pale faced and anxious her voice was steady and she took things coolly. Sister Mamie was greatly frightened at first, but after a few minutes she overcame it and asked for the rifle, with which she was a tolerably fair shot.

The first move of the Indians was to take possession of the log barn, which stood about 200 feet away. There was little or nothing in it, and if they fired it the distance was too great to endanger the house. They opened fire on the two rear windows and we kept away from them. Now and then one of their bullets came through a loophole, but we were out of range. The Indians must have known that father was gone, and they probably hoped to scare us with a great noise. They continued shooting for half an hour, and then one of them stepped out from the barn and asked for a "talk." In reply Mrs. Webster fired a charge of buckshot which knocked him over, and we saw his body dragged around the corner of the barn.

The Indians now scattered and encircled the house, and, dropping down whenever they could find cover, they opened a steady fire. By sitting down on the floor we were safe from any bullets which might enter the loopholes. They simply wasted their powder, and after an hour all but four of them started off down the road. Their impatience was too great to permit them to tarry longer. There were hundreds of other settlers who had received no warning and made no preparation, and were waiting, as it were, to be plundered and murdered. The four who remained stood just out of rifle shot to watch the door, and we did not see another Indian until nearly sundown. Then a band of about seventy five came along. Some were on stolen horses, some on foot, and about thirty of them were packed into two wagons, which they had taken from white men.

From the yelling, shouting and shooting indulged in one would have thought our chances were slim. A part of the force occupied the barn, so as to command the rear windows, while the rest made a sort of rifle pit to command the front. The two who had been killed in the morning still lay where they had fallen, and as darkness came on we made ready to receive any one coming after the bodies. It was a starlight night, and about 9 o'clock I caught sight of two warriors creeping up to the spot. I called Mrs. Webster's attention, and by the time they were up we were ready for them. As they were moving the scantling off the body we fired upon them, and neither one moved a yard after being hit.

Now came a full hour during which not a shot was fired or a shout uttered. Then the Indians began shooting blazing arrows at the roof, and I have no doubt that twenty or more alighted thereon. That danger had been provided for, however, and when they found they could not burn us out they fell back on another plan. From one of the back windows I saw them carrying a long pole to the front of the house. There were several of these lying near the barn, and it was now plain that they were going to try the power of battering rams. I saw one made ready at the back of the house as well, and when I told Mrs. Webster she posted Mamie and me at the back windows while she stood at the front. The Indians had planned a real attack from the rear, with only a feint at the front. With five men at each pole they made a rush for both windows at once, while the front of the house was only menaced. Mrs. Webster saw through the plan in time, and came running back just in time to secure a loophole. She and Mamie had the shotguns, while I had the revolver, and the Indians did not get within five feet of the house.

Our volley was followed by screams and yells on their part, and those who had not been disabled beat a hasty retreat. From that time until morning we were left undisturbed, but they succeeded in carrying off their dead. We could not tell then what damage we had done, but several weeks later, at the trial of the chief conspirators and leaders, it was stated by an Indian that we killed seven and wounded six redskins in our defense.

When morning came not an Indian was in sight, but before noon we had half a dozen men and women with us who were fleeing for their lives, and before night we numbered twenty. It was a week before we were relieved, and during that time bands of Indians turned aside at intervals to attack us and be beaten off with loss only to themselves. It was one of the two farm house forts in that great area of country which made a successful resistance, and but for our success the number of murders would have been added to by at least two dozen.—New York Sun.

Don't Waste Postage Stamps.

"Why do you Americans put five cents on a letter to Mexico when two are enough?" asks a business man writing from the city of Mexico. "Is cash so abundant in northern homes that you can so waste it? Pray tell your people that only a 'phule' will put any more postage on a Mexican letter or paper than on one destined for the United States—else why the postal treaty? One-half my correspondents thus foolishly contribute to Uncle Sam's exchequer." This advice is well timed. Most people know that letters to Canada need bear but two cents postage for each ounce or fraction thereof, but it is less generally known that the same rate applies to letters sent to Mexico, which is too often regarded as a "foreign country."—Springfield Republican.

Miss Anderson's Tour.

Mr. and Mrs. Navarro are spending the latter portion of their honeymoon in a tour through the Midlands, and have been staying at Nottingham, with which town the bride has grateful associations, having produced "A Winter's Tale" at the Theatre Royal some years ago with great success. They attended high mass at the Roman Catholic cathedral on Sunday, and were more or less in evidence in the streets of the town next day, but so unexpected was their appearance that, though the features of the bride are familiar enough to most people, they happily escaped recognition, and the inevitable mobbing of the curious which would have followed. "How like Mary Anderson," said the proprietor of a shop where they made some purchases to a friend, and the resemblance was certainly striking.—Pall Mall Gazette.

How to Tell a Black Hen's Egg.

A man who was fond of a joke went to the market, where he stopped at a poulterer's stall.

"Two dozen black hen eggs, if you please."

The woman in charge opened her eyes wide with astonishment.

"I can."

"Well, then, choose for yourself."

Collection Boxes Not Much Used.

Collection boxes were at one time used in many churches. The old style is a shallow open box about seven inches long by five wide. It is lined with velvet and has a handle attached. Boxes of this style are still used, but collection boxes are now generally made circular in form. They are seven and a half inches in diameter and two and a half inches in depth. A plush mat is laid on the bottom, and the box is provided with a handle two feet or three feet long. Such a box of oak sells for $3.50. Not many boxes are sold nowadays.—New York Sun.

A Pretty Toilet Article.

Make a very pretty hairpin holder in this way: Remove the bottom of a small round Japanese basket, stuff with hair combings, crochet of Saxony, in the old fashioned loop stitch, two pieces three inches square, insert in top and bottom of the basket, suspend by loops and ends of one-fourth inch ribbon and you have a pretty, useful and inexpensive article for the dressing table. To vary this I made one leaving the bottom of the basket in, filling with hair and covering with the loop stitch top; the mat to set it on was made about five inches from the center, the last four rows crocheted very full to imitate a frill. This was tacked to the bottom of the holder, which had a dainty bow on one side, the pins being stuck in the top.—Cor. Housewife.

Silk Dye.

A favorite method with silk manufacturers of imparting a pale straw color to pieces of silk is to steep them in a very weak solution of hydrochloric (muriatic) acid. This cannot be practiced with success by the housewife, as the process is a somewhat delicate one.—New York Recorder.

STOCKTON BUSINESS COLLEGE.

An Institution that has Made Its Way to the Front by the Energy and Ability of the Proprietor W. C. Ramsey.

In the business education of this coast no institution ranks above that of the Stockton Business College, with a sister college at Fresno, under the same management, known as the Fresno Business College. The departments of the college are three—Business, Teachers' and Shorthand and Typewriting.

Not only is tuition cheaper here than at any similar school on the coast, but board and room with all the comforts of a home are placed at the disposal of their patrons at $10 per month, and parents may rest assured that every influence is placed around those under the care of the school to restrain and build them up to perfect manhood. Mr. and Mrs. Ramsey with five others of the teachers are constantly with the students.

Mrs. Ramsey, a lady of excellent culture, never tires in her ministrations. Much of the success of the school is due to her intelligence and able supervision.

The school occupies all of two entire buildings, aggregating about 30,000 square feet of floor room.

All of the arrangements are such as only years of experience in educational work could embody, and during this summer another story will be added, thus enlarging the facilities for doing satisfactory work.

The Business Course is so exhaustive as to include all that is practical, and as thorough and comprehensive as years of study by business men can make it.

The Teachers' Course is so complete that it is a rare thing for one to fail in examination who has done the work assigned them. During the past year over one hundred have gone directly from the school and passed the various examinations throughout the State.

While the Shorthand and Typewriting Course is such as business men everywhere can endorse, and graduates from the school are in demand by those who appreciate what care and drill can do in fitting for the active duties of life.

Mr. Ramsey is a young man and is wide-awake, progressive, honest, intelligent, genial, and determined.

The school was established in 1875, and has constantly increased in numbers and usefulness until now between 600 and 700 students attend annually. Mr. Ramsey has for years been arranging and selecting his teachers until his present corps of sixteen is a paragon of excellence.

Penmanship is a leading feature of the school, and we would advise all to send for specimens. These will be sent free to any one, and gives one an idea what can be done with a pen. No one study is of more value.

The school has long since been recognized as the leading school of its kind on the coast, and we as a public journal, guarding the best interests of the people, could not feel that our duty was done unless we made mention of the fact, for the school is not alone of the highest type but it is a place where no one need fear to trust a son or daughter, as they are shielded and surrounded ever by the best of influence.

It was mentioned to Jekyll that one of his friends, a brewer, had been drowned in his own vat. "Ah, he exclaimed, "floating in his own watery bier!"

As a Cure for Sore Throat and Coughs, "Brown's Bronchial Troches" have been thoroughly tested, and maintain a good reputation.

Little Johnny—Say, ma, does a minister really need all the slippers that are given him? Mrs. Brown—Yes, indeed. His son is generally very bad.

Big, but bad

—the old-fashioned pill. Bad to take, and bad to have taken. Inefficient, too. It's only temporary relief you can get from it.

Try something better. With Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Pellets the benefit is lasting. They cleanse and regulate the liver, stomach and bowels. Taken in time, they prevent trouble. In any case, they cure it.

And they cure it easily; they're mild and gentle, but thorough and effective. There's no disturbance to the system, diet or occupation. One tiny, sugar-coated Pellet for a laxative—three for a cathartic. Sick and Bilious Headache, Constipation, Indigestion, Bilious Attacks, and all derangements of the liver, stomach and bowels are promptly relieved and permanently cured.

They're purely vegetable, perfectly harmless, the smallest, and the easiest to take—but besides that, they're the cheapest pill you can buy, for they're guaranteed to give satisfaction, or your money is returned. You pay only for the good you get. This is true only of Dr. Pierce's medicines.

A Kansas editor makes this profound remark: "A good many people dislike society, and it is believed that they are afraid of company, but, as a matter of fact, it's finger bowls."

HIS PERSONAL EXPERIENCE.

L. T. Harrington, ex-Sheriff of Chautauqua County, New York, writes:

"I am glad to say, from a long personal experience with ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS, that I am able to endorse all the good things that have ever been said about them, and supplement these by saying that I frankly believe their value cannot be estimated. Their breadth of usefulness is unlimited, and for prompt and sure relief to almost every ache and pain that flesh is heir to, no other remedy, in my opinion, either external or internal, equals them in certainty and rapidity. I have used them at one time for rheumatism, another for backache, again for bronchitis, always with the same result—a speedy cure."

SAFETY IN THE MIDST OF DANGER.

This would seem a contradiction—is so, in fact, to the eye. But experience has proved its possibility. Take the case of the individual who dwells in a malarious region. A robust constitution is no certain defence against the dreaded chills. What is? Recorded testimony, covering a period little short of half a century, proves that Hostetter's Stomach Bitters is precisely this. This continent does not limit the field where the medicine has proved its efficacy. In South America, the Isthmus of Panama, Mexico, everywhere in fact where miasma-born disease takes on its most obstinate and formidable types, the Bitters is a recognized specific in illimitable demand, and prescribed by physicians of repute. Potent, too, is it in disorders of the stomach, liver and bowels, and against that destroyer, la grippe. It improves appetite and sleep, neutralizes rheumatism and kidney complaints.

The way of the transgressor is hard; but he doesn't realize it until he has had a fall on it.

FAMED HARRIET HOSMER.

An American Girl Who Has Won Great Honors.

SHE WILL MAKE HER HOME IN CHICAGO.

What She is Doing and What She has Done.—Reminiscences.

CHICAGO has a hospitable ring to her voice in welcoming all strangers who seek a home within her elastic borders. But to those who have won distinction and wear the laurels that city ever holds out an especially cordial and gracious greeting. She wants the best in persons as well as in things, and is liberal in her desire not only to possess them, but to bestow on them all honor and a just appreciation. Chicago was rejoiced a year or so ago to welcome Harriet Hosmer as a citizen, both in her personality as a woman and in her capacity as a sculptor.

For the past half year Miss Hosmer has been absent, spending the time in London and Rome. The Queen Isabella association engaged her, at a cost of $25,000, to model a statue of Queen Isabella of Castile, to be unveiled at the coming World's fair, this statue to be erected out of doors and overlooking Lake Michigan. Lacking facilities for the work in America, Miss Hosmer journeyed across the water. Chicago only loaned her, however, for the better accomplishment of her task, and has during the interim held both her and it in interested regard, awaiting a return.

On arriving in London Miss Hosmer went forthwith to the British museum, where, through the polite courtesy of Professor Stuart Poole, all customary formalities were in her behalf dispensed with, and she was enabled to get at once to work. Months were spent in preliminary investigation and many were the old volumes diligently searched through.

Miss Hosmer has crystallized all this study in her little wax model. This design represents Queen Isabella as stepping down from her throne and in the act of offering her jewels. This action gives a finer play of line and movement to the statue than could have been secured from a seated figure. Isabella, too, is crowned, because it was as queen that she aided Columbus. The historic costume worn by royal Isabella lends itself easily and well to sculpture, the flowing drapery furnishing the long, sweeping lines which bestow grace and dignity. The queen in the model wears a side girdle, and on her breast is the ornamented cross which is to be seen in all portraits extant of her. Miss Hosmer is pleased and quite satisfied with her model, and herself says to those who would like to see it done better, "Let them try."

Chicago was expecting to welcome Miss Hosmer home last month, bringing with her the completed design, but her arrangements have been altered and she will now remain in Rome until the statue, which is to be of heroic size and made in bronze, is cast.

As this statue is destined to attract universal attention at the Columbian exposition, it may be of interest to read a sketch of its famous sculptor.

Miss Hosmer was born in Watertown, Mass., so long ago as 1830. She was delicate as a child and inclined to lung trouble, which was inherited. Her father, who was a physician, anxious for her health, furnished her with boat, gun, dog and horse, and she, being by nature active and fearless, soon became expert in all outdoor sports. These exercises overcame her predisposition to physical weakness and won for her a rugged constitution. Miss Hosmer also as a girl developed great vigor of mind and a will of unusual strength, as well as a frank and joyous spirit. Not one of the many merry stories told of her romping schoolgirl days, or of her later defiance of conventionalities and independence in manner of living, can be discredited as we look into her face today, which, though above sixty years old, is kindling with fun, glowing with enthusiasm, and, above all, resolute with purpose.

In 1850 it required individuality and courage for a woman to select sculpture as a profession, and Miss Hosmer's early days were days of bravery. She journeyed from Massachusetts to St. Louis in order to secure a thorough course of instruction in anatomy, which was not then to be had in any eastern medical college by a woman. St. Louis today bears testimony to her gratitude and generosity by having an ample share of fine examples of her work, notably the Beatrice Cenci and statue to Thomas H. Benton. Miss Hosmer's first purely imaginative piece was done in the little garden studio at her home in Watertown, and was entitled "Hesper," it being alike the child of her poetic conception and of her own handiwork.

HARRIET HOSMER.

But the Eternal City beckoned Miss Hosmer, and the year 1852 found her in John Gibson's studio in Rome receiving that artist's training and winning his interest. Gibson had lived in Rome for thirty-four years and was known to every one by the musical name of Signor Giovanni. Miss Hosmer subsequently was called "la signorina," and in cap and blouse worked in a small room formerly occupied by Canova. Financial reverses came to her father about this time, but this calamity seemed only to stimulate our sculptor's industry and effort.

There is scarce any greater pleasure to be enjoyed than Miss Hosmer's conversation when she becomes personally reminiscent. Her face glows and kindles as the memory of some merry occurrence or incident presses. "A man is known by the company he keeps," aye, and a woman also, and who can introduce us to so distinguished a circle as can Harriet Hosmer? Drawn to her through her genius were many friends. Miss Hosmer, in her early days, numbered the weird Nathaniel Hawthorne among them. He at that time was writing his "Marble Faun," and knew Rome thoroughly. While acting as her guide to many places mentioned in this book of his, Hawthorne assured her that the characters of Miriam and Hilda were wholly fictitious.

Miss Hosmer says that Hawthorne was painfully shy and silent when among strangers, but with a group of chosen friends he revealed a fund of anecdote and a wit rarely reached and not easily surpassed; a crowd, however, seemed to render him dumb. On one occasion when she was present, Hawthorne was called upon to make returning thanks for a public testimonial, bestowed personally upon him, when he simply said to the large audience assembled, "I love you all," and sat down.

It was through Mr. Gibson that Miss Hosmer knew Thorwaldsen, whose saying of sculpture that "the clay model may be called creation, the plaster cast death and the marble resurrection" she is so fond of quoting. Also through Gibson Miss Hosmer met Flaxman while he was struggling with such dire poverty that he was often obliged to leave the modeling tools and take up the pencil. It was during one of these straits of penury that Flaxman made the exquisite illustrations of Homer and kindred subjects to fill an order from the Wedgewoods to decorate their wares.

Miss Hosmer has enjoyed the hospitality of George Sand at her villa and speaks enthusiastically of this writer's graciousness, of her ease and fascination as a hostess, of her beauty, her mobile face and magnificent eyes. She knew also the homely Victor Emmanuel with his mustachios and Garibaldi in scarlet blouse and military cloak. Miss Hosmer does not think, in conversation, that Garibaldi was much of a conqueror, save when he told of battles he had fought and won. To Miss Hosmer Thackeray was agreeable, though he cared very little to please, and avoided all effort, thus making himself generally unpopular.

NATHANIEL HAWTHORNE.

George Eliot told Miss Hosmer that every sentence in her novels came from her mind complete and stood in her published books just as she first set them down with her pen, but she added, "The birth of each sentence costs me a pang." Miss Hosmer thinks this especially true of her later tales—certainly of "Middlemarch," and says she has seen many of this novelist's manuscripts and they appear wholly without a correction. She also says that the author of "Adam Bede" was quite given to affectation, an unusual trait in those who are truly great.

Upon no memory of friendship does Miss Hosmer more delight to linger than upon her intimacy with the Brownings During her residence in Florence she dined daily with them at Casa Guidi. Mrs. Browning, Miss Hosmer says, was pure in character, tiny in person and delicate in health; always writing with a pen two to three inches long, easily covered over by her hand and then secreted in her pocket. This Mrs. Browning always did when any one approached, lest they should feel uncomfortable to have caused her an interruption. She says Mrs. Browning was never seemingly busy, but accomplished very much. Miss Hosmer always found Robert Browning sincere, honorable, without assumption of authority or taint of vulgarity, and she pictures the domestic life in the Browning home as an ideal one.

Miss Hosmer has permitted no recent pictures made of herself. She says there is a lien upon her face as it is at present, but the lineaments shown by our cut are the same which today mark her countenance. Her face is interesting and keenly intelligent, and one is particularly struck with her small and delicate hands. She is rather low in stature, broad and sturdy in build, alert and quick in movement and works with an absorbed and indefatigable energy. She affects a style of dress purely original and not likely of imitation.

Miss Hosmer has been several times decorated. On occasions of note she loves to pin across her breast, in a straight line, the gold and silver stars and bright hued ribbons of honor. At such times she greatly resembles Charlotte Cushman and also General Rosecrans. When speaking standing she usually advances one foot and bears herself as a brave general commanding. And is she not a conqueror? Has she not won from out the solid stone and expressed in enduring marble, great thoughts and noble truths which her clairvoyant soul saw hidden there?

USES OF SOME BIRDS.

Position They Occupy in the Economy of Nature.

HABITS OF MANY FEATHERED CREATURES

Ways in Which Water Birds and Other Fowl Assist Mankind.

In recent years much attention has been paid by naturalists to examining the stomachs of various birds in order to ascertain the character of their food. In those of most water fowl a percentage of seeds and roots of aquatic plants has been found. A subject well worthy of consideration is whether the migratory instincts of all water fowl is not partially utilized to carry these seeds and roots to points far distant from one another, which could not be reached by water currents, thus performing the part for water plants that air currents do for terrestrial growths.

Shore birds, such as snipe, sand pipers, yellow legs, plover, devour large quantities of beetles and worms injurious to shore and shallow water plants. They also assist in the transporting of seeds from place to place. On toast their transporting qualities affect us in another way.

Owls and hawks until within late years have had only the uncommercial value, of wisdom and sharp sight allotted them. But by a shorter method than the stomach pump investigators have clearly shown that few more valuable birds to the agriculturist exist, and now, instead of offered premiums for their scalps, they are allowed to retain them, and are protected by law in their possession. Their chicken thieving is an epicurean eccentricity not worth considering when compared with their habitual consumption of mice and other small animals which do great injury to the farmers' trees and crops. The farmers' poultry is under his immediate protection, but he cannot well go mousing to save his products.

MANY KINDS OF HAWKS.

Undoubtedly the entire falcon family demonstrate that bird will eat bird, but the varieties devoured by most of them in any appreciable quantity are such as are indirectly useful to man as insect killers only. The appetite and capacity of one hawk for insects much more than compensate for those of all the birds it kills.

The sparrow hawk is by far the most numerous of its species. Its chief food is grasshoppers. When this insect is to be had the most tempting morsels in feathers are eschewed.

The red shouldered or chicken hawk, as it is miscalled, seldom eats chickens; then in winter only. Its food consists of small quadrupeds, small birds, lizards, frogs, snakes and insects.

The marsh hawk—the sportsman's special antipathy—never preys upon the game for which sportsmen seek. It is a rapacious eater, varying its bill of fare with frogs, coleopterous insects and diminutive members of the feathered tribe.

The sharp shinned or partridge hawk is the Robespierre of the air—blood, blood, no matter whence it comes. He has a liking for spring chicken, raw, garnished with feathers. He finds quails toothsome and ducks pre-eminently to his taste. He passes sentence upon almost everything that flies, yet the number of these he kills is unimportant when compared with the entrees of his bill of fare. In fact the sharp shinned and the cooper's hawk are the only members of a large family that have a few tastes in common with man. Because of this alleged sin the immense good they do should not be forgotten.

THE USEFUL OWL.

Owls continue by night the good work of the hawks by day; mice, moles and reptiles are their regular food. The barred or hoot owl and the great horned owl are the only members of the family having an unsavory reputation. The barred owl claims right of priority to an occasional partridge, and retaliates upon the sportsman's encroachment upon its preserves by foraging upon the chicken yard. It feeds principally upon mice and small birds and reptiles.

The great horned owl is singular in its partiality for skunk (no one should entertain malice toward it for that). Its children cry for it. Its nests are invariably infected by its odor. While its food consists of pheasants, large game, ducks and poultry, the dining on a single skunk gives it respectable standing as a friend to the poultry raiser and sportsman, together with all having noses in any degree more sensitive than wax ones.

The barn owl outrivals the cat as a mouser and as a nerve stirring musician by the eloquence of its silence.

For fifteen years within the writer's knowledge a neighborly pair of screech owls have dwelt upon a west Philadelphia lawn, in the midst of an unusual quantity of nesting birds and in close contiguity to a chicken yard, without routing a nest or disturbing a chicken, so far as any indication has ever shown.

BIRDS THAT EAT INSECTS.

Birds other than owls, that care for men's interests while men sleep are the whip-poor-will and night hawk. They live upon butterflies and moths, but enterprising experimenters have been known to try the potato beetle, and it is to be hoped that they were pleased. Dr. Warner found them in the stomach of a whip-poor-will, which undoubtedly indicates a fondness for them or two inconceivable blunders in succession.

Insects are such rapid breeders and so prolific that without the insect eating birds we would have ten thousand plagues. Upon excellent authority the ancient Egyptians found one—that of the grasshoppers—to be enough, and occasionally in our own good time we have had bitter experience of what the tiny pests can do when helped by favoring seasons, or are unchecked in their proclivities for large families. The army worm, grasshopper, potato beetle, wheat weevil, curculio, the ubiquitous mosquito and unrivalled leaf destroyer—scream raising—anathematized measuring worm, the various caterpillars, have devastated vast regions, injured entire crops, stripped cities of their leafy lungs and protecting shade trees, and kept human wrath at a monopolizing temperature.

The caterpillar of the apple tree and the larvæ of fruit injuring insects are favorites of the cuckoo. To the fruit growers it is invaluable, and the farmer heeds its prognostications of coming rain with far more certainty than those of the best of aneroids. —Charles McIlvaine in Philadelphia Ledger.

A ROMANCE IN CITY LIFE.

Not far outside of New York city, in one of the suburbs whose shores are splashed by the waters of the Hudson, stands as tidy and attractive a house as it is possible to find. Its plate windows glisten brightly in the sun, the well kept lawns are the comment of every one who rides by; in short, it is an ideal suburban home. It is occupied by a woman, now a trifle over forty years of age, with a face which still bears the marks of its singular beauty in youth. Early in life she was one of the belles of one of our great eastern cities. She became engaged to a young man of brilliant prospects and social standing; but a lover's quarrel broke off the match, and almost shattered the intellect and health of the beautiful girl. She left home, and living alone and in poverty she determined to begin a career for herself.

She had literary talent, and this she developed by writing stories. At first she met with poor success, but faced by starvation and too proud to return to her family she resorted to writing sensational stories for the cheap weeklies. Success began to favor her, and she soon found her stories in greater demand than she could mentally supply them. Night and day she worked with the pen, however, and for eight years she toiled on, denying herself every pleasure and comfort, carrying ninety cents of every dollar which she earned to the savings' bank. Her goal was for a home of her own, nestled in some quiet place, somewhere away from the theatre of her youthful career, where, all alone, she might enjoy the peace and quiet for which her aching soul pined.

At the end of nine years she chose the spot where she now lives, and under her own eye built the beautiful little home which today is her temple of rest. During the process of building she kept on with her literary work, writing more industriously than ever to gain a competency on which she might live. Two years after the time she had purchased the ground she moved from her humble city apartments to her country home. From that moment till the present day she has never written a line for publication, although for a long time her publishers offered her large prices. She had accomplished the object for which she toiled so hard; and now, with a home of her own, and a small but comfortable income from her invested literary earnings, she lives in quiet and peace, her lot shared only by a young girl who runs her errands and does minor household work.

Her neighbors never see her except when she is working in her garden during the open season. Her home faces the water and looks over to the opposite shore of the Hudson. There, directly opposite to her house, began to rise, two years ago, a palatial residence, now completed, the upper windows of which often throw the reflection of the setting sun into the open door or curtained windows of the more modest dwelling of the literary recluse. The handsome home on the western side of the river is that of a rich merchant, whose wife is a well known society leader, and whose children are the admiration of their circle. The merchant knows not who lives in the trim little house on the opposite shore. The sweet faced woman, whose life happiness now is within herself and her home, is ignorant of the occupant of the mansion on the other shore. Only a few persons know the occupants of both houses, and they do not lift the veil, for peace and contentment dwell in the houses on both shores, and why disturb their tranquillity?—Edward W. Bok in Ladies' Home Journal.

Ivy on the Front Walls.

European travelers visiting the United States invariably declare that the residence districts of Boston are more attractive than those of New York. There is an easy explanation to be offered for their preference for the New England capital. Boston has found a substitute for shade trees in the finest residence quarter. The long blocks of substantially built brick and stone houses there are covered with ivy trained as high as the second floor line or to the roof, as the taste of the occupants requires less or more of this beautiful screen of fresh foliage.

The absence of trees passes unnoticed when the eye is refreshed by constant glimpses of verdure on the house fronts. On the hottest midsummer days the residence streets of Boston look cool and attractive. The monotonous character of the architecture is concealed by this most graceful and luxuriant of vines. In the streets of New York there are fewer shade trees than are to be seen in Boston, and hence there is more urgent need of vine planting; but the residents here have been slow to appreciate the necessity for screening and decorating their brown stone fronts. New York streets have a bare and cold aspect. Ivy planting on a large scale is needed in order to improve and beautify the massively built residences.—New York Tribune.

Was Columbus a Jew?

Jews figure prominently in the history of the discovery of America. The plans and calculations for Columbus' expedition were largely the work of two Hebrew astronomers and mathematicians. Two Jews, also, were employed as interpreters by Columbus, and one of them, Luis de Torres, was the first European to set foot in the New World. When Columbus sighted the island of San Salvador he imagined he was approaching a portion of the East Asiatic coast, and he sent Torres—who was engaged for his knowledge of Arabic—ashore to make inquiries of the natives.

It was, probably, this Torres who was the Madrid Jew to whom Columbus bequeathed half a mark of silver in his will. Another curious fact is that it has been seriously suggested, by Dr. Delitzsch we believe, that Columbus himself was a Jew, or of Jewish birth. The name Christopher was frequently adopted by converts, while the surname Colon was borne by a distinguished family of Jewish scholars. Christopher's brother, Diego, bore originally the Jewish name Jacob, which sounds surprisingly like a Shem Kadosh. Perhaps some Jewish scholars in Italy will make inquiry into the validity of this daring suggestion.—Jewish World.

When Handkerchiefs Were Rare.

One of the most curious notes about the early use of the handkerchief in polite society is the evidence we have in literature that the article was frequently lent, and passed from hand to hand for use.

But this was in the days when soap was unknown, and when even high born ladies of the court bathed so seldom that the practice was hardly known. We read much of the elegances and refinement of the old courtly days, but these elegances did not include many of the common refinements that the poorest people of the present day practice.—Youth's Companion.

One of the highest observatories in the world is about to be erected in Tananarivo, Madagascar. It will be in every way complete, and the site chosen for it is about 4,400 feet above the sea level.

LIKE POETS--BORN, NOT MADE

Men Who Have the Faculty of Making Money.

PEOPLE OF EXPEDIENTS IN BUSINESS.

A Man of Perseverance who Made Millions From Soap.

"I have been reading with considerable interest," said a New Yorker yesterday, "the discussion that has been presented in the columns of The Tribune on the advantages or disadvantages which a college education confers upon a young man who has his own way to make in the world. Leaving aside for the time being the fact that far too many people think that success in life means either great wealth or distinction (second rate results, both, and not to be compared to culture of the mind and to health), let me say that of all the traits with which a man can be endowed, none will be so helpful to him in any walk of life as that of being ready with expedients, of being prepared for the emergency. You hear plenty of men who have the average amount of intellect and education grumbling that they never get a chance to succeed and envying those who do. The truth is that they have not that instinct which sees opportunities to enter where others see only an insurmountable wall of difficulty.

"Take the case of B. T. Babbitt, who died the other day a millionaire several times over. He began life as a blacksmith's apprentice, and devoted the best of his days and the best product of his brain to making soap—not an exceedingly lofty calling, but he made a colossal success at it where a great many others failed, and just because he was a man of almost inexhaustible expedient. Whenever a rival came too near him in the race Mr. Babbitt used to sit right down and think out some new bit of machinery which would turn out the work a little cheaper than the old one, and then he would go to work and build it.

"'Ah,' you say, 'he was an inventor—few men have the gift of invention.'

"Invention, my friend, is only another word for expedient. It's the same faculty, whether expressed in a new machine, or a new way to 'bear' stocks, or a new way to advertise patent medicine. It's often amusing to hear men who have not got this faculty, men who could not be pushed into making money in any but the old beaten paths, speak with anger and suspicion of the success of others. There is something positively dishonest to these men in the extraordinary adaptability of those others, and the power of turning into gold opportunities which are absolutely invisible to most men seems wizardlike and unholy.

"It always has been so, no doubt, and probably always will be. Countless men have striven for wealth in this city since the days of the first John Jacob Astor until now. They were ready to take any and every chance, honest or dishonest, to amass fortune, and have been unable to do so; so they have solaced themselves somewhat by carping at others, who, with the same advantages, or less, the same opportunities, honest and dishonest, have steadily reaped their thousands and tens of thousands in the same fields where others could find only the stubble of bare livelihood.

"To be able to see anything from all sides at once, in fact to be fertile and expedient, is the master secret to fortune and to distinction, if that is what a man sets out to win. It is not imparted by an education, either at the college or in the shop, but is born in certain individuals and not in others. Of course few people are born without any of it, and I think the proper kind of education might be evolved to develop the embryo that lurks in most of us; but after all, this idea is a good deal like the discussion over the best kind of food for brain workers. As some clever fellow has said, 'the very best thing for a brain worker is brains, and plenty of them.'"—New York Tribune.

An Ingenious Hired Man.

All hired men are ingenious, only some are more so than others.

One day a gentleman sent John, his coachman, milkmaid and bottle washer, to the neighboring village for fifty cents' worth of two cent stamps. After the usual time—say three hours—had elapsed John returned from his tramp of two miles. His face wore a self satisfied look when he came into his employer's presence.

"Got the stamps, John?"

"Yes, sir," the man replied, handing over a bunch of one cent stamps.

"I said two cent stamps, John, and you've got ones."

"Yes, sir," and the smile widened, "I asked for fifty cents' worth o' stamps, and the postmaster, says he, 'One cent or two cent?' 'Do you sell one cent stamps?' says I. 'Yes,' says he. 'Well,' says I, 'if yer can buy stamps for a cent what's the use of payin' two?' an' I bought the one cent stamps, sir."

Where People Drink Blood.

The old legends of how the giants of Cornwall slew great fat oxen by the score and used their warm blood for drink while they champed the rare flesh between their great teeth have for centuries afforded material for many a nursery tale to the horror of the youthful listeners. If the drinking of the blood and the eating of raw beef were the only requisite to be a giant, then Louisville could form an army of giants. The very thought of such a thing is enough to sicken most people, but it is a fact that there are scores and scores of persons in this city who satiate their thirst by drinking blood, and who appease their hunger with raw, bloody beef. Of course they do not do this all the time, but they probably would if the opportunity were presented. Such persons are very reticent on the subject, not because they are ashamed of it, but for the reason that it might disgust their acquaintances.—Louisville Courier-Journal.

The Curious in Numbers.

A lover of the curious in numbers has figured out some interesting facts concerning the city of Berlin. The city has 210 miles of streets, so that a person might walk ten days in the German capital without going up or down the same street twice. If the 1,400,000 inhabitants were to turn out at a grand review, and march in double file, they would form a line 750 miles in length, a column long enough to reach nearly entirely across France. If the citizens should all determine to start on a journey on the same day and at the same time all the cars in Germany would accommodate but two-thirds of their number. If formed in a single file, each with his hand on the other's shoulder, the column would be nearly 2,000 miles long. If separated until only within speaking distance of each ether, the column would be a human telegraph line long enough to reach from Berlin to Calcutta, India.

"DICKENS' DUTCHMAN."

Hardly the Abused Creature the Novelist Painted Him.

It is rather a trite subject to refer to the prisoner whom the great novelist made famous by his pity, and who afterward became known as "Dickens' Dutchman," and yet there are features of the marvelous manner in which he gave the lie to the story of "Boz," which Richard Vaux told me, of which he is a part, which may not be generally known. The reminder that this man, Charles Langheimer, was one of the prisoners with whom Dickens conversed, of whose condition he drew such a mournful picture, is scarcely necessary. He compared the little garden leading into the main cell to a grave.

"A more dejected, heart broken, wretched creature it would be difficult to imagine. I never saw such a picture of forlorn affliction and distress of mind," wrote Dickens, and later on he added: "I never saw or heard of any kind of misery that impressed me more than the wretchedness of this man." What a spectacle! This poor creature being driven into his grave by the heartless regulations of the system of solitary confinement! That was in 1841. In 1870 Dickens died. In 1885 Charles Langheimer was still alive. But that is not all the tale. When the novelist saw the German thief he was serving a second term of imprisonment in the penitentiary. After that he served twelve more, or fourteen in all, in the same institution. I once saw him in the quarter sessions after he had been sentenced to a brief imprisonment in the county prison. With tears pouring down his cheeks he begged to be sent back to the penitentiary, even if his time was doubled. His request was granted.

With Langheimer stealing was a disease. Mr. Vaux tells me that at one time he could have trusted him to carry a thousand dollars in gold to bank, but upon his return, if he saw a doorway open he could not resist the temptation to enter it and pick up the first thing he could lay hands on. After his last imprisonment his daughter, who is married to a very respectable man, refused to have anything more to do with him. He was then 80 years of age, and without a penny. He was given an order of entrance to the almshouse. With this in his hand he entered Mr. Vaux's office and said: "See what I have come to. Please don't let me go to the almshouse. Send me out to the prison. It is the only good home I ever had. Please send me back there."

If Dickens could have heard those words I wonder what he would have said.

"Charley," said Mr. Vaux, "I don't know whether or not the warden can take you in, and then, too, you are a dreadful nuisance. But if you will promise to behave yourself you can go out to the prison and ask the warden if he can find room for you."

He presented himself and made his request and pleaded earnestly that it might be granted. Finally the good hearted warden said: "Well, if you behave yourself I guess we can find room for you and enough for you to eat." The old man actually leaped for joy and tore his almshouse pass into bits, which Mr. Cassidy, the warden, afterward collected and pasted together, and the card is now one of the curiosities of the big building. The next time Mr. Vaux visited the prison he met Langheimer, who began one of his customary complaints—similar, probably, to that which deceived Dickens—this time the trouble being of an alleged rheumatic character. Mr. Vaux jocosely seized him by the shoulders and shook him until he screamed. The next time they met, the old man said, laughingly: "Mr. Vaux, shake all the rheumatism out of me!" But in a few days the pains of old age, whose meaning he did not understand, returned with renewed violence, and he sent for the warden. When Mr. Cassidy saw him in his cell he knew that poor Langheimer's time had come, and two hours later he quietly breathed his last in the prison in which he had spent the greater part of a prolonged life. Solitary confinement had permitted him to die of old age.—Philadelphia Inquirer.

White and Deaf.

Mr. Harrison Weir, president of the National Cat club, England, says in his book, "Our Cats," that a white cat of the long or short haired breed is likely to be deaf. Should it have blue eyes, the fancy color, it is almost certain to be deaf.

Mr. Weir, at a cat show, purchased a white cat, a beauty, loving and gentle, for the low price of two guineas. When he got it home, the cat proved to be "stone deaf."

Then the trouble began. If shut out of the dining room, its cry for admission could be heard all over the house, for, being deaf, it did not know the noise it made, though its owner often wished that it could hear its own cry. When it called out as it sat on his lap, it called with ten cat power, and its commanding voice caused it to be named the "Colonel."

One day a friend saw the "beauty," and admired it so much as to accept it as a gift, even after being told that it was "stone deaf." A few days after Mr. Weir received a letter from the friend, offering to return the loud voiced cat.

"Give it to any one you please, but don't return it to us," was the reply.

The "Colonel" was given to a deaf old lady, and both were happy.

One Hundred Yards Dash.

The fastest running thus far done by any amateur for 100 yards from a standstill is ten seconds, and if one may believe the best authorities in the way of sporting journals, amateur runners have been coming up to this limit occasionally ever since 1868, but not one has passed it. In that twenty-odd years some eight American amateurs and an equal number of Englishmen have dashed down the track in the even time of ten seconds, while hundreds have run the course in the next fraction of a second. This record was made first in London in 1868, and last in Detroit in 1889. —Walter Camp, in Century.

A Delicate Repast.

That sprightly Rockland skipper, Capt. Otis Ingraham, of the steamer Penobscot, displays a piece of white cloth about the size of a pocket handkerchief, with curiously frayed edges, which is all that is left of a very elaborate night robe. The garment was a present to the captain, but while hanging on the line at his home in Rockland it was appropriated by a goat belonging to his son. As the goat's regular diet is tomato cans and hoop skirts, he regarded an embroidered night shirt as a real delicacy and of course didn't leave much on the plate.—Lewiston Journal.

Sentiment and Cents.

Helen (dreamily)—How fitting that lovely flowers should have a language of their own! They seem created to silently voice the sweetest fancies. Is it not so?

Harry (cruelly)—Yes. But to me they silently voice solid, frozen facts. Five dollars for a small bouquet and cash with the order. I suppose this is the language of the thorns.—Pittsburg Bulletin.

GHOSTS AND STORIES.

Curious Yarns About Phantoms and Sleep Walkers.

A MAN FRIGHTENED BY HIS OWN IMAGE.

Extraordinary Experience of Two Little Girls.—A Supposed Burglar.

Ghost parties are much in fashion. All you need is a jolly company and a small quantity of alcohol burning on a saucer in the darkened room. While the spirits flare blue and ghastly each one of the people present takes his or her turn at telling some weird yarn—personal experiences are by far the best—of grizzly phantoms and spooks almost too horrible to mention. If the story telling is good the test of its quality is established by the thrills that run down the backbones of the listeners.

At such a party in Washington one night a young Noodles was telling of a ghost he met with at an old country house where he had been invited to stay for a week. On the evening of his arrival he was told in a joking way by members of the family that the bedroom allotted to him was haunted, but he paid no attention to the matter, his belief being firm against the existence of phenomena supernatural. So when the time came for his seeking his couch he went off to sleep without much delay, and must have been in the arms of Morpheus for more than an hour, according to his reckoning, when he was aroused by a noise. He sat up suddenly in bed and found himself confronted with what he at once recognized as a supernatural apparition.

A WEIRD SPECTER:

It stood at the foot of the couch and eyed him, with face of ghastly whiteness and garments that seemed of luminous consistency, swaying to and fro. Somehow it appeared as if it were the image of himself in grave clothes.

Noodles shrunk beneath the quilt and lay there for at least three minutes—it seemed an hour to him—before he dared look out again.

"By Jove!" he said, "it must have been only a dream."

Then he raised himself once more to a seated posture, and fairly screamed aloud when the sepulchral image rose again before his gaze at the foot of the bed.

With a burst of resolution that afterward surprised him Noodles jumped out of bed and turned up the gaslight close by, which he had prudently left at a bead before retiring. Then the grewsome mystery was quickly dispelled. Facing the rear end of the bed, with windows on either side, was an old fashioned bureau. Through the windows streamed the moonlight, while the summer breezes played with the white muslin curtains. When Noodles sat up in bed his reflected image naturally appeared in the looking glass, his torso clad in a ninety-nine cent night shirt. The moonlight, shining full upon his own person, made the reflected simulacrum appear very bright, while the curtain floating about in the wind gave the effect of white drapery such as is suitable to corpses that walk abroad.

Noodles looked sharply at the faces of the family when he came down to breakfast the next morning, but he did not understand then, and he has never been sure since whether or not his experience was the result of a rather ill judged practical joke.

The next story teller told of an experience much more harrowing, though no ghosts were concerned, which she and her sister had met with in childhood. Both of them were addicted to walking in their sleep, and it was not unusual for them to join in a sort of co-operative somnambulism and wander off at night from their bedroom together. On one occasion their mother had met them in the hallway under such conditions, and slapped them so severely that they did not repeat the offense for quite a twelvemonth. But about a year after the event referred to they got up in company and made their way down stairs into the cellar. Probably the chill air woke them up—at all events they did wake, and not finding themselves in their snug beds they were put in a fright. Said one of the little girls to the other:

And the other replied:

"We must be dead and buried."

She had felt the damp, cold wall of the cellar trickling with clammy exudations. No wonder that such a horrible thought occurred to her mind. What else imaginable could account for a situation thus encountered? The little girls felt their way along the prison that enclosed them. Nothing but a wall of moist stone for many feet, and then a corner, and again to the right at an acute angle for what might have been a mile or two, so it seemed. Once more a corner, and to the right the children groped, their hearts half dead within them, past the endless wall wet as with the dews of death. Wonder it is that they did not die of sheer fright. But, as it happened, the little girl who told the story, now a woman grown, with children of her own, touched something that was made of wood and gave a great cry of joy. For the wooden object was a step, and it was not four seconds later when the two children had run up the cellar stairs, mounted to the second floor and sought consolation in their mother's arms.

The next story teller told about a fright that he had one night while he was engaged in locking up his house in suburban Washington about one year ago. He was going from the dining room to the culinary quarters when his attempt to open the kitchen door was met by an unmistakable resistance. When he strove to throw wide open the portal it was shoved back upon him. He gave a leap across the threshold, and upon looking behind the door beheld a man somewhat taller than himself, with a remarkably large aquiline proboscis and long black whiskers So much of the intruder was visible in the gloom, and the master of the establishment struck at him with all his might. He hit something, but withdrew his knuckles somewhat bruised and cut, while the objectionable person with the Roman nose remained apparently unhurt and undisturbed. Again and once again he struck, and only after the third blow had been delivered did he discover that the offender was merely a twelve pound turkey that had been hung up behind the kitchen door for the next Sunday's dinner. The breast bone was the Roman nose and the wings, left on the bird au nauterel, represented the black whiskers.—Washington Star.

A Queer Wager.

Charles Queen, a Norfolk man, bet that he could let a gallon of water drop on his hand from a distance of three feet, drop by drop. After 500 drops had struck him he yelled "Enough!" and paid the bet of $50. He said that each one fell like the blow of a sharp stick, and a blister as large as a quarter was raised on the back of his hand.

INYO INDEPENDENT.

J. H. Mulholland,
EDITOR & PROPRIETOR.
PUBLISHED EVERY FRIDAY.

INDEPENDENCE, CAL.
FRIDAY, MAY 27.....1892

The staunchest advocates of protection are the most stubborn opponents of all attempts to exclude or even check the vast hordes of ignorant and servile foreigners who are flocking into the country and driving American citizens from every occupation.

The leading business men of England are urging their government to remonetize silver, and they predict a speedy crisis if it is not done. This is a different attitude from that taken at the boodler's canvention at Stockton.

Dan Burus on one side and Kelley and Crimmins on the other are waging bitter war for the control of the Republican party. Each side calls the other thief and liar, and, as they know each other well, doubtless both are right.

Of the twenty "hold-over" State Senators it is figured that not more than six can be relied upon to stand by the interests of the people as against corporations. The bosses will endeavor to secure for their employers as many as possible of the twenty to be elected.

The vast fortunes acquired by Carnegie and others through extravagant protection, are balanced by the steadily increasing millions of dollars in mortgages heaped upon the farms in every State and Territory. McKinleyism does protect, but the protection it gives is for the few to rob the many.

The census report shows that in Kansas and Nebraska farms are mortgaged to half the value of the land. Farmers work half their time for the benefit of their creditors and must support themselves and their families out of the other half. This is the kind of protection that McKinleyism gives to American labor.

The merchants of San Francisco say that the business of the city is in a deplorable condition. The railroad monopoly is killing—has killed—the trade of the place. The impeachment of the Railroad Commissioners is recommended, they having notoriously prostituted themselves and helped the monopoly to rob the public. The Democratic convention at Fresno put a plank in the platform that the Commission be abolished. During the twelve years of its existence it has steadily betrayed the people. Railroad influence prevent all mention of the Commisanion at Stockton.

A recent report on the business of the Erie Canal gives some very interesting facts. It is shown that the amount of tonnage carried on the canal for the year 1891 was equal to one fourth of the freight carried on all the railroads in the United States. The average cost of the freight was four mills per ton per mile. The average freight rate on railroads is a fraction under one cent per ton per mile. The freight on goods brought into Inyo County by rail is a fraction over ten times the average rate for the whole United States, and more than twenty-five times the average charge on the Erie canal.

A recent decision by our State Supreme Court is a glaring exhibit of the slavishness of that tribunal. A locomotive ran into a street car in Los Angeles. An aged woman who was in the car had bones broken and was nearly killed. She sued the Southern Pacific Company for damages and got judgement for several thousand dollars. The Company appealed to the Supreme Court with the following result: The Court stated the long fixed principle of law that the principal is responsible for the act of the agent; but as the engineer in charge of the locomotive put his engine in motion just for fun, and to frighten the people in the street car, his employers are not responsible for his acts. Judgment reversed, and the old woman went, or rather was carried out of Court without a cent. Uncertainty is a very uncomfortable state of mind; it is therefore highly satisfactory to know that when locomotives crash into conveyances of any kind in our State and mangle and kill a lot of people, all the worry of a law suit will be spared, as the Court has established that the engineers only dash into such conveyances for the fun of seeing chips fly and hearing the squeals of the people; therefore their employers are not responsible and it will be useless to go to law. Such monstrous decisions as this will continue to be rendered so long as corporations by controlling a great political party can have their creatures made Judges.

VEGETARIAN FARE.

A WOMAN WHO EATS NO MEAT AND LIVES ON $1.30 A WEEK.

Mrs. Le Fevre, of New York, Tells About Her Diet of Nuts, Grains and Fruits. It Is Really Very Attractive—Something About Those Who Eat Meat.

Why is it there are only about 200 vegetarians in New York city, less than the number in either Boston or Chicago? In the latter city visits to the sanguinary meat packing establishments have driven people to a nonmeat diet, and there is a large and increasing class that forages upon the fruits, nuts and leaves of the earth.

These facts were communicated to me the other day by Mrs. Le Favre, the leader of New York's vegetarian 200. She has not eaten meat for four years. A diet of nuts, fruits and seeds she claims is more wholesome and much cheaper than one composed of flesh. Her thirty day experiment of living on her favorite foods at the lowest possible cost was recently told of. She brought her table board down to $1.30 a week. She claims that with this she committed many gastronomical extravagances and that the price can be still further pared down.

Mrs. Le Favre goes a little further than most vegetarians in discarding roots and leaves altogether. The humble potato, the succulent lettuce and the homely cabbage are not to be found upon her bill of fare, nor will she partake of radishes, turnips, carrots or the many items usually so well relished that come under the head of roots or leaves.

She thinks that they are a very poor class of nourishment and intended only for horses and pigs, though under a vegetarian dispensation what the pigs are intended for it would be difficult to say. Some of the proprietors of vegetarian sanitariums who find potatoes somewhat cheap and excessively filling for their patients take issue with her on these points.

I don't think that Mrs. Le Favre is a very hearty eater, as eaters go, but she is very well nourished and does a vast amount of work for the fuel she consumes. I doubt if any meat eater of my acquaintance can do more labor of brain or muscle than she.

For her breakfast she eats cereal food, granula, wheatena, rice or corn. Of one of these things she takes a tablespoonful and a half, costing perhaps one cent, and cooks it. Then she has a cup of coffee, costing about one cent more, and a slice or two of whole grained bread at less than a penny a slice, and concludes the repast with an orange or banana. The quantities given are not large, but they can be increased to suit the appetite, and the heartiest eater, she thinks, couldn't very well make away with more than ten cents' worth.

The luncheon consists of a plate of lentil soup, a most nourishing dish, involving an outlay of about half a cent. This is followed by a vegetable of some sort well cooked, a few olives or nuts, two slices of bread, some fruit, canned cherries or something like that or pudding. The check for this meal would be seven or eight cents.

Supper is made up of whole grained or oatmeal bread, preserves, bananas or oranges and a little chocolate.

Once this antimeat advocate saw a porter in the east carrying a large piano down the street on his shoulders. She became interested at once and wanted to find out what food would produce such enormous strength. She inquired and found that he lived chiefly on green cucumbers and garlic, and never devoured flesh at any time. Two-thirds of the people in the world—three-fourths some people assert—never eat meat and wouldn't know how to.

In Boston there are vegetarians of the second generation—that is, their parents had eaten no flesh for some years before they were born and they themselves have not broken their fast upon roasts and boileds. To these people the sight of a butcher's shop or a wagon load of deceased pigs is exceedingly repulsive.

There is no vegetarian restaurant in the United States, and the nonmeat eaters want to start one in New York. London has at least forty places where one can dine upon the vegetable fat of the land without tasting flesh. The number and variety of dishes that are served in these places would startle the unsophisticated and shock a butcher.

Vegetarians everywhere realize that the best way to preach their doctrine is to induce people to eat one of their meals. Bachelors and spinsters bent on dietary reform and ignorant of cooking, or perhaps not having a kitchen at their disposal, find it hard to board at a restaurant and not live on meat. They can live on apples, perhaps—Mrs. Le Favre did once for two weeks and grew stout and healthy—but many of them might not care to.

"All the fighting of the world is done by meat eaters," said Mrs. Le Favre. "Flesh engenders a fierce restlessness which finds vent in war. Vegetarians, while they will work unceasingly, are not fighters, but they win their point by gentleness and persuasion.

"There is a constant craving for stimulant in a meat eater. Children fed on flesh swallow slate pencils and ashes. It is because their system calls out for the carbonates and lime of vegetables. Vegetarian children never eat their slate pencils.

"A square mile of land will sustain six times as many vegetarians as meat eaters. Think of the waste there is here! Meat is the most extravagant food we can use. The overcrowding of the earth will compel the universal adoption of vegetarianism.

"The roots and leaves I consider food for the lower animals. The pig grubs in the ground for his potatoes, but I don't. I pluck the rich, ripe grain, the nuts and the apple. I consider the apple the finest food there is. An electrician can arrange apples in a row and obtain a current of electricity from them. I think we should eat only the very best form of nourishment, and I consider that the nuts and fruits answer this requirement."—New York Herald.

Very striking to a stranger is the Englishman's fashion of covering his face with his tall hat as soon as he has taken his seat in his pew in church.

The Hindoo makes his toes work at the loom, using them in his weaving operations with almost as much dexterity as he does his fingers.

A race of wild dogs is said to exist in Newfoundland, keeping near the coast and subsisting on what the sea casts to the shore.

Heirs Apparent and Presumptive.

There seems to be a good deal of confusion in the minds of the public and the press as to what constitutes the difference between an "heir presumptive" and an "heir apparent," and one gentleman who has been informed that there is no "heir presumptive" to the throne at the present time, writes to inquire of me whether Prince George of Wales is not entitled to that designation. I should say certainly not. In point of law, the heir is the party who succeeds to an estate or a dignity by the demise of the previous holder; and a man can only have during his life an "heir apparent," or an "heir persumptive."

The Prince of Wales is now the heir apparent to the throne, and while he lives there can be no other heir. Prince George is the heir apparent to the princedom of Wales, and he is not heir to the throne at all, except in the loose and inaccurate sense in which all persons who may by any possibility become entitled are spoken of as "heirs."

The difference between an heir apparent and an heir presumptive is that the heir apparent must succeed if he survives the present holder of the dignity; while an heir presumptive, although the heir at the moment, is liable to have his right to the succession defeated by the birth of another heir. There cannot, therefore, be at the same time an heir apparent and an heir presumptive. Should the Prince of Wales succeed to the throne, Prince George, if then living, will become the heir apparent to the throne. Should Prince George succeed to the throne before he has children the Duchess of Fife would be the heir presumptive, her right to the succession being always liable to be defeated by the birth of a direct heir to her brother.—Henry Labouchere in London Truth.

A Chilly Affair.

"Mr. Simpkins-Harold," she said, with faltering coyness, while he gave a sudden start of terror as the thought that this is the year 1892 flashed upon him, "I am the bearer of a message from my father. He says that you must come here no longer without stating your intentions. And, Harold, you know this is leap year, and—and, oh, need I say more?"

"Miss Boggs," replied the young man, recovering his self possession and his hat, "am I to understand that your father charged you to deliver to me an ultimatum?"

"Why, yes, Harold, if you will use those newspaper terms at such a moment."

"Say to him, then," said the young man, "that his representative is persona non grata to me, and that I firmly but respectfully decline to continue diplomatic relations."

In a moment he was gone. But the young girl did not falter. "Persona non grata, am I?" she mused. "That might have done a week or two ago, but it has been shown that when really serious complications have arisen that plea doesn't go. And I just reckon, Harold Simpkins," she continued aloud, as a rosy flush mantled her plump cheek, "that I've got a little batch of diplomatic correspondence which, when read before any court of breach of promise arbitration in the country, will bring me in a good big indemnity too."—Chicago Times.

ELKELES—At Bishop, May 19, to Mr. and Mrs. Jacob Elkeles, a son.

Mrs. T. Richards of Lone Pine is visiting in town.

The weather has been quite showery for the last few days.

G. Singer of Alvord spent a couple of days in town this week.

El. Walker and W. T. Grant were up from Olancha early in the week.

H. B. Boland came up from Cerro Gordo on Tuesday and spent a couple of days in town.

The water supply has been greatly increased during the last few days owing to the late warm weather.

Rev. C. L. Logan delivered an interesting stereopticon lecture at the M. E. church on Wednesday evening.

Eamon Spencer of Big Pine was in town last Monday evening, with a numerously signed petition for the appointment of W. H. Ullmeyer as a member of the Board of Supervisors for the Third District.

Robert O'Neal of Bishop was appointed as the Inyo county representative on the Democratic State Central Committee by the Fresno Convention. Mr. O'Neal is a prominent business man and will take an active interest in promoting the success of the party.

On Wednesday evening next Miss Margaret Sybil Conklin will be united in marriage to Louis V. Olcese at St. Francis Church, Bakersfield. Miss Conklin lived at Independence from childhood, and a host of warm friends here wish her the utmost happiness in her new estate.

The soda works at Keeler closed down last week. The fact that the works were all cleaned up and put in good shape for inspection leads to the belief that the sale to the English syndicate will be effected, and that the property was put in condition for the transfer.

A party of Independense people made a trip to Onion Valley in the early part of the week and to the lakes near there. They report the largest lake to be entirely frozen over, and a consideroble quantity of snow lying about it. It will be much later than usual this year before camping parties will find a trip to the mountains a pleasurable one.

Mr. J. P. Blaize, an extensive real estate dealer in Des Moines, Iowa, narrowly escaped one of the severest attacks of pneumonia while in the northern part of that State during a recent blizzard, says the Saturday Review. Mr. Blaise had occasion to drive several miles during the storm and was so thoroughly chilled that he was unable to get warm, and inside of an hour after his return he was threatened with a severe case of pneumonia or lung fever. Mr. Blaize sent to the nearest drug store and got a bottle of Chamberlain's Cough Remedy, of which he had often heard, and took a number of large doses. He says the effect was wonderful and that in a short time he was breathing quite easily. He kept on taking the medicine and in a few days was able to come to Des Moines. Mr. Blaize regards his cure as simply wonderful. 50 cent bottles for sale by

THE RAILROAD ORGAN.

The "Index" Plays the Music Furnished by the Railroad Company, but Will the People of Inyo Dance to the Tune?

The Index this week makes a complete acknowledgment of the facts stated in the last issue of this paper in regard to Mr. Craig's position with the railroad company. Henceforth the Index must be publicly recognized as the official publication of the C. & C. Company, run solely in the interest of that concern. It will be thoroughly understood by the people of Inyo county that any course advocated by the Index must be that most acceptable to the railroad managers. Any utterances and sentiments the Index may give voice to and any line of conduct it may pursue, must, by the public claim of its editor, be strictly railroad. Now that Mr. Craig has openly and publicly announced that he is in the employ of the railroad company he will meet with more consideration than when his intentions were masked under the disguise of working in the interest of the people of Owens Valley. As to the influence and effect the railroad has upon Inyo county every man must judge for himself. But rememember this: If the railroad does not benefit you, if it works an injury to you, every dollar you contribute to the support of the Index is so much to-ward sharpening the knife to cut your own throat. Every man who advertises in, or supports the Index assists the railroad company to support an institution laboring in its interest and in its employ.

The Index says: "The company is particularly to be congratulated upon the fact that this reduction is a voluntary act and free-will offering to the increasing trade and business of Owens Valley, and as such it will be accepted by the people with becoming grace and gratitude." What absolute rot! The railroad company is not doing so much business now as it was a year ago. The real reason of the reduction was that given by Mr. Craig; they want to force the big team to quit hauling and to prevent other teams going on the road, which would have happened immediately had not the reduction been made by Mr. Craig's advice, he being aware that such was in contemplation. Two merchants of Independence had for some time past been endeavoring to get lower freight rates and were only successful when the railroad managers were informed that a team would be started hauling from Mojave at once if the freights were not reduced. It is far better for us to pay sixty dollars a ton to the teamsters for freight than twenty dollars a ton to the railroad. Every dollar paid to the teamster is left in the Valley while not a cent of the railroad money ever gets back here. This question has been gone over at length before, and there is no need repeating it. The fact is apparent to every thinking man. The only question is, will you aid to build up and support a concern whose avowed effort is, to use the expression of the chief railroad magnate, to make you "peons" and slaves to the will of the C. & C. owner.

How It Works In Mono.

The people of Mono county are having a little experience with the railroad. The following is taken from the last issue of the Chronicle-Union:

D. A. Bender of Carson, General freight Agent of the Carson & Colorado Railroad, and Senator Forbes, of Hawthorne, Nev., were here this week, having visited our county for the purpose of trying to divert our freight traffic from Carson from over the Antelope and Sweetwater roads to the railroad. They met with no success here, and they went on to Lundy to see what they could accomplish there. The people of Bridgeport and Lundy have no cause for complaint in regard to our freights, which are delivered here cheaper than they can come by the Hawthorne route; and again our own people are benefited, as nearly all the teams are run by Mono County men. Had the railroad company shown common sense the rails would have been laid from Carson Valley and up through Smith Valley to Sweetwater and then on through to Inyo, and then the road would have secured the trade of this entire section of country, whereas it is now starving in running through a country that can give it no business. Stick to your old teamsters who spend their earnings among us!

Weather Bulletin.

KEELER, Cal., May 20, 1892.

The Chief of the Weather Bureau directs the publication of the following data, compiled from the record of observations for the month of June, taken at this station during a period of seven years.

It is believed that the facts thus set forth will prove of interest to the public, as well as to the special student, showing as they do the average and extreme condition of the more important meteorological elements and the range within which such variations may be expected to keep during any corresponding month.

A traveling man who chanced to be in the store of E. V. LONE PINE CORRESPONDENCE.

A few days ago one of my neighbors having been afflicted periodically with rheumatism, was stating to me that one of the best remedies, not only to relieve him in such a case, but also as a preventative, was pure claret wine used as a tonic in connection with alternate friction of the affected parts with sedative water and alcohol; and knowing that I always keep the best of clarets on hand, he wanted to buy a gallon from me. My answer was that I have no license and cannot sell any; and he said, pointing to my United States Internal Revenue tax receipt, "What is that? Has the United States gone into bankrupcy after receiving of you $25 granting you the privilege of selling liquors for twelve months ending June 30, 1892, or has the Government forfeited its pledge of honor by a breach of promise?" I had just begun to answer: "No it is—" when Mrs. V., who had been there listening to our conversation, said: "No, it is not a bankruptcy, nor a breach of promise. This is simply one of the usual tricks daily played between men and men, between people and people and, as the people represent the entire Government, it is one part of the Government against the other part. The first part imposes, collects and receives moneys for the support of the general government and gives a receipt by his legal representative to the effect that the payer is entitled and has the privilege to retail liquor for the period of twelve months and the payer having faithfully and honestly complied with all the requirements of law, depending on the honesty of the government, has invested his capital in buying goods accordingly; and after paying the said taxes and licenses, with a stock of goods for twelve months on hand, here comes the government represented by the executive power of the county, which by induction exercises also the legislative power, increasing the county license amounting to a prohibition, which with contempt renders nul and void the Internal Revenue tax receipt granted for twelve months by the highest authority of the land, without regard to equity or equality, for if we consider that it is not the laudable and wise organic law of the United States that governs the land in all its branches, and that our State Constitution has been with contemptible intents, by some interested members of the State Legislature, taken in derision, and unhappily a part of the members of the Legislature who were honest, were not skilled to defend the right of the people against the treacherous means used; and the majority of our honest Legislators were subjugated by the smart minority. Hereunder is a specimen of it:

The Constitution of the State of California, Article XI Sec. 5, says in regard to county and township officers, "That the Legislature shall regulate the compensation of all such officers in proportion to duties, and for this purpose may classify the counties by population." By virtue of said Section 5 the Legislature classified the counties of the State by population from the First Class to the Forty-fifth; and said Legislature, instead of complying directly and honestly in conformity with said Section 5, to regulate the compensation of county officers (for which sole purpose the classification was ordered and made) denied said Section 5, and here is the evidence of it. The Act of the Legislature of Feb. 26, 1883, reads as follows:

"Counties having a population of 2,600 and less than 3,000 shall belong to and be known as counties of the Forty-third class. In counties of the Forty Third class the county officers shall receive as compensation for the services required of them by law or by virtue of their office the following salaries, to wit:

County Clerk, $3000 per annum; Recorder, $2000; Auditor, $1000; Sheriff, $5000; Tax Collector, $2000; Treasurer, $15 0; Assessor, $2500; District Attorney, $1500; Coroner, $400; Public Administrator $400; School Superintendent, $1000. This is the share of Inyo county, with less than 3000 population pays $20,300 per annum to seven men, and the counties of the next class, the Forty-fourth, from 2000 to 2600 population pays to their seven officers for the same services only $4,800 per annum; and the counties of the Fifteenth Class, from 12,801 to 13,000 inhabitants, pay to their eleven officers, whose services are about five times greater than those of Inyo county, only $12,300 per annum. The above is in conflict with the State Constitution, which reads as follows:

Article I, Section 22.—"The provisions of this Constitution are mandatory and prohibitory." Also Article IV, Section 25. "The Legislature shall not pass local or special laws in any of the following enumerated cases." That is to say, the 20th, affecting the fees or salary of any officer. And to prove the ignorant neglect of our Legislators, I mean the honest ones, and the smartness of those who were knowingly working against the interests of the people when the matter of excessive salaries was brought before the Legislature for amendment, the same was amended, but the aforesaid smart Legislature brought in that the fees or salaries of county officers could not be affected during the term of office for which they were elected, and we had to pay for the same. And we are still paying the same, according to special law, and in conflict with the State Constitution. And on the same principle of unjustifiable means our Board of Supervisors, knowing that the retail liquor dealers of the county were paying a certain county license, the amount of which had been fixed by said Board, and dealers depending on their honor, sent for and paid their Internal Revenue tax for twelve months, and with no good cause they increased the amount to be paid for a county license, which is excessive. The rule followed by the State Legislature that the salaries of county officers cannot be decreased during their term of office could have been followed by our Board of Supervisors in regard to the increase in county licenses and have the same to take effect and be in force from and after the 12 months term of the United States Internal Revenue tax paid by said dealers. But the difference between the two forces, the Legislators and the Supervisors is, that the smart minority of the Legislature employed their talents and succeeded in the allowance of unlawful salaries which enriches the county officers at the expense of the tax and license payers, and the Supervisors employed what they call their talents, which shall be demonstrated before long to be dangerry, in depriving some of the license payers of their legal rights, granted by the United States Revenue Collector."

Thereupon Mrs. V. bought one of the nicest hats in my store (suivez moi) for Julia, and I told her to call again.

ROYAL

IS THE

Best Baking Powder

The Official Government Reports:

The United States Government, after elaborate tests, reports the ROYAL BAKING POWDER to be of greater leavening strength than any other. (Bulletin 13, Ag. Dep., p. 599.)

The Canadian Official Tests, recently made, show the ROYAL BAKING POWDER highest of all in leavening strength. (Bulletin 10, p. 16, Inland Rev. Dep.)

In practical use, therefore, the ROYAL BAKING POWDER goes further, makes purer and more perfect food, than any other.

Government Chemists Certify:

"The Royal Baking Powder is composed of pure and wholesome ingredients. It does not contain either alum or phosphates, or other injurious substances.

"EDWARD G. LOVE, PH. D."

"The Royal Baking Powder is undoubtedly the purest and most reliable baking powder offered to the public.

"HENRY A. MOTT, M. D., PH. D."

"The Royal Baking Powder is purest in quality and highest in strength of any baking powder of which I have knowledge.

"WM. MCMURTRIE, PH. D."

A SONG OF FLEETING TIME.

When love was rich and young, my dear,
And all the world was fair,
What music beautiful and clear
Made summer in the air.
The roses blushed around your door,
The sunshine trembled o'er your floor
And blessed you unaware—
From dawn till eve, from fall till spring
Life offered you each royal thing.
Yes, you, who did not care
When love was rich and young, my dear,
And all the world was fair.

When love was rich and young, my dear,
And all the world was fair,
It was a heavenly thing to hear
Your laughter bless the air.
To note your dainty ways, and mark
Your eyes make starlight of the dark,
To know that everywhere
Men's hearts went with you, every one,
Like Aztecs following the sun
Whose fleeting left heaven bare—
When love was rich and young, my dear,
And all the world was fair.

Now love is poor and old, my dear,
And all the world grows gray.
There is no music left to cheer
The curfew time of day.
About your lonely door I see
The shadows falling silently,
Like brown leaves from the spray;
Flown are the roses and the light,
Gay hearts have bidden you good night
And gone upon their way.
Now love is poor and old, my dear,
And all the world grows gray.

Now love is poor and old, my dear,
And all the world grows gray.
Heart breaking is it but to hear
The laughter once so gay;
To mark your faded charms and know
The rose has had its time to blow,
And joy to pass away.
One thing, one only, of the past
Abideth with you to the last,
Your poet's song still holds you fast
And keeps you fair alway.
Now love is poor and old, my dear,
And all the world grows gray.

—Elvira S. Miller in Louisville Courier-Journal.

THE MAD LOCOMOTIVE.

"A story of railroad adventure, eh?"

"If you please," I answered the veteran engineer, as we sat in the cool shade to the east of a big Providence roundhouse. I may say that Peter Hank, the narrator of this exciting incident, is well known by me and esteemed as a man of truth by everybody who knows him.

"I never had but one son. All my boys were girls. But when little Burnside was born I tell you we were happy. Yet I never supposed that chap would save my own life and lots of other people's. That's just what he did, however. You know I always run the express. We got a big engine some years ago on the road. She weighs more than any machine we ever used before. I never liked her when I saw her in the shop, that giantess, No. 643. She never had any name. And that machine never liked me. All because of this." The engineer took his pipe from his mouth to look me squarely in the eye. "I was in the shop one afternoon just to look her over. That's when they were painting her up. The painters and varnishers were crawling all over her.

"Of course she wasn't fired up. Another engineer and I just were walking round her huge body. I said: 'Jake, that critter will heat the first trip, and a hot box on her will mean lots of work. I hope I may never be asked to run her.' Well, sir, believe it or not, I know she heard it and was mad. When I climbed into her cab, just to look at her there, I naturally enough took hold of her reverse lever. She threw that lever over, sir, quicker'n lightning, and caught my leg just under the knee, taking out a bite as big as a walnut. My! How she pained me! It was weeks before my stiff leg was all right."

Then he resumed his pipe while that soaked into me.

"Now, you newspaper men do not take any stock in such things, I know. But no railroad man would say I was a fool if I thought hard of the machine. And all railroad men have seen engines act just as if they had spirits in them. There ain't an engine on our road or any other which will work as well for one man as she will for another. Every engine has her favorites, for whom she will do anything, and her enemies, to whom she acts like a she demon."

A fact, by the way, which the writer has since verified on considerable inquiry among locomotive engineers.

"Well, sir, if you believe me, that No. 643 hadn't been out o'shop a week before the master mechanic sent for me one night to take her. I remember I was eating supper. It was my two days' lay off. Little Burnside was sitting in his chair beside me. He was just 8 years old the Thursday before. It was a very hot August night. I was asked to put the big engine through for a special. There was a party of big fellows from Washington who were returning from the White Mountains. I was to drive 'em down to Wickford Junction for Newport.

"'God help me, Susie!' I said to my wife, pushing back my chair. 'I don't know why, but I'd rather be killed by a pistol shot here at home than to go.'

"'You foolish fellow!' she replied. 'What ails you?'

"'I don't know,' I said. 'But that machine hain't been run a dozen times. Besides she hates me. This is to be a show off run, like lightning, and I know she'll kill us all.'

"My wife she just rose up then. Being a good Christian church member as I ain't, she exploded on me.

"'Pete, I'm ashamed of you! You're the best runner on the road, and this is an honor. Do you want to get discharged and lose our daily bread? God will take care o' my husband. Here! It's a hot night, and you'll be back by 11 o'clock. Take the boy. He's always wanted a night ride.'

"That got me. I just rose up. She put on the boy's little cap and gave me his coat, and I went off, taking the boy. I remember how he laughed. I carried him over the rails in the dark yard on my shoulder, and he kept patting my cheek and kissing me till I boosted him into the cab of No. 643. How proud he sat up there on my box between my legs!

"Well, again," continued Pete, rubbing a fresh match on his overalls, "nothing occurred as we coupled on and ran quite a while. We drew four Pullmans besides the baggage car. It was hot and dark. We had the right of way, but were to approach Wickford cautious, for there we should find the regular New York express, which we should overtake. No. 643 worked stiff, as I knew she would, but she was so big that when she got started nothing could trouble her much, and she just tossed the load along as light as a feather.

"I noticed that the throttle valve worked hard when I had to shut off steam once or twice slowing through a station. Still I could jerk her in and out well enough with one hand. An ugly throttle is a terrible thing, sir, though. For, you see, a man can't be sure. Suppose you couldn't shut off. Suppose your throttle got stuck, full head on, going at fifty miles an hour, and you a-coming into a station, for instance, even if there was nothing standing there, I tell you, you'd feel about as the Almighty would if the earth got loose and he couldn't stop her."

Then Hank puffed smokeless whiffs.

"Well, again," he resumed presently. The excitement of his own memory had brought the sweat drops to his forehead; his pipe had gone out the third time. "That throttle valve did stick on me! That's just what did happen. We were, I calculated, about eight miles from Wickford. Somehow, though, there wasn't any station to slow me up, yet I had a feeling, an awful feeling, too, that I could not if I would shut her off. 'Pshaw!' I said to myself, and I played with the boy's curly head with my right hand. But my left hand kept pressing and trying that throttle harder and harder. I couldn't stir her! I reached over and put my right hand on the lever. I could not move her! I got off my box. I seemed to be in a perfect frenzy. I sprang at the valve with both hands and all my weight. She didn't move a hair! And the way we were kiting! Probably we were flying over fifty miles an hour. I yelled at the fireman:

"'Give us a hand, George!'

"He knew it all in a second, and tumbled in from the tender to put both his hands beside mine.

"'Now!' I shouted.

"We threw our weight against it. But that old beast just shook herself and jumped and jumped, as much as to say, 'You can't shut off my wind!'

"'Pete!' cried the fireman, 'there's the Wickford on the switch! We've only two miles more to live!'

"Then we struggled like two mad bulls. We pulled. Then we shoved. We planted our feet and pulled and shoved. We had no air brakes in them days. But if we had, I vow I b'lieve to have put 'em on would have knocked out the cylinder heads or broke a driving rod, and sent us all to eternity.

"All this while there sat my pretty boy, as calm, as laughing, because he thought this was all play. But I knew we'd all got to die, and I caught up the boy. I held him, kissing him. It all took but a moment. There, less'n a mile ahead, stood the rear of the 'New York' on our track at the station. I could see her red light. You better b'lieve I forgot all about the big men behind. I was thinking, should I throw out my boy into the darkness?

"'Papa,' said Burnside, 'what makes you look so?'

"'Because, boy, we can't stop the engine. We're all going to be killed in a minute, unless I toss you out there.'

"'No, papa,' said he, reaching out his pretty hand. 'Let me try it.'

"Well, I did. I don't know why. I was holding him, you understand. And sir, the moment that child's hand struck that throttle valve, she shut off as easy as drawing your breath!"

The engineer said he actually tumbled over on his seat as if he had seen a miracle. The train slowed up in answer to the brake whistle, and stopped just in front of the station. The matter may or may not have had any miraculous element. The good mother urged the boy's going. The behavior of the metal, one moment binding by heat or other expansion, the next moment releasing itself helped by the tremendous steam pressure in the dome, is one of the many well known curiosities of metal action.

"Would you really have thrown that boy from the cab if she had not stopped?" I asked.

"Certainly. It would have been the only chance of saving his life. I should have chosen a bunch of green, growing brush and landed him safely up against the bending branches. Then I should have jumped myself. We always jump when we can do no more good here. My fireman has three times saved his life so. I have once, of which I'll tell you some day. Good-by. Here's my machine, just out of the yard."—Rev. Emory J. Haynes in New York Ledger.

A young Wisconsin man, A. P. Hanson by name, who is now a resident of Copenhagen, has made an invention that is likely to inaugurate an era in printing. He calls it a colorgraph. By it two or three or even more colors can be printed on the same paper at one impression.

A WOMAN DOCTOR'S BROUGHAM.

It Is Nothing More Nor Less Than a Private Traveling Dressing Room.

A busy woman doctor in Brooklyn, whose practice is so extensive that it keeps her driving over the city's ill paved streets for many hours every day, has had made for her a brougham which combines about as many comforts as is possible to pack into so confined a space. To begin with, under the seat is a capacious drawer, divided into compartments, to hold those surgical instruments which a doctor must carry.

In the same drawer is found room for two or three small handbags containing an assortment of medicines. There is also space for a small portable electric battery in its polished wood case. These are all hidden away, however, when the drawer is shut, and so do not mar by their painful suggestiveness the snugly comfortable appearance of the rest of the interior.

There is nothing out of the way about this, of course. The novel features are all in the front of the brougham facing the occupant. The most "striking" is a pretty clock, by which the doctor times her visits and the speed of her coachman. It is screwed to the wall, so to speak, at a convenient height. Underneath it is a silver plated flower holder, for the doctor has lost none of her essentially feminine tastes because she has learned how to saw your leg off.

Then in a little pocket in the lining of the carriage is a manicure set, for a doctor's hands should always be a joy to look at, even when they belong to a man. In another pocket is a brush and comb and some hairpins. This doctor's hair is thick and long and a little unruly, being generally charged with electricity from her intensely energetic spirit. In another pocket is a whisk, for the roads are mostly dusty in Brooklyn, and the doctor's costumes have inspired many a young woman to acquire a profession. Another fold hides a scent bottle. Sickrooms are often poorly ventilated.

There is a mirror, of course, that can be hung on a hook just below the clock and then returned to its pocket. A fan peeps out there, a glove buttoner here and a bigger pocket than all has generally one or two of the latest numbers of the magazines; medical ones for the doctor's own perusal as she bowls along, and more entertaining ones for her friends. For this doctor is seldom seen driving about alone.

She generally has some of her patients or her friends with her, and when conversation flags, or the guest is waiting in the brougham while the doctor is calling on a patient, the magazine keeps the time from dragging. Even her coachman gets the benefit of this feature, and he may often be seen, looking more comfortable than "correct," leaning back upon his box with a copy of a recent publication in his hand.—New York Tribune.

Strange Oversight.

It is dangerous as well as wicked to do wrong in the presence of children. An observant little boy was in a street car the other day, and followed every movement of the conductor with the greatest interest.

A very stout woman boarded the car and sat down next to the small boy. She took a ticket out of her purse, but when the conductor came along he somehow failed to notice her. He passed and repassed her several times, and finally, with a nervous glance around, she replaced the ticket in her purse.

This was too much for the small boy, who had all the while kept his eye on her, and the next time the conductor came along he exclaimed:

"You didn't get her money, mister. I don't see how you missed her. She's the fattest lady in the car. Anybody could see her."

This complimentary allusion to the woman's weight caused a blush to play over her broad face, and she quickly produced a ticket, while all the other passengers smiled.—Pittsburg Dispatch.

November in American History.

A most notable November in our history was that one in 1765, the first day of which was observed throughout the thirteen colonies as a period of mourning, on account of the going into effect of the hated stamp act. It increased the burden of taxation upon those who had no voice in their own government and aroused them to such a sense of injustice that ten years later they rebelled and the war of the Revolution was begun. On the first day of November, therefore, the church bells were solemnly tolled, flags floated at half mast and business was everywhere suspended. All over the land such men as Samuel Adams, Patrick Henry, James Otis and John Adams addressed patriotic speeches to throngs of their countrymen and fired their hearts with thoughts of a glorious independence.—Kirk Munroe in Harper's Young People.

A Suit Made of Ratskins.

A thrifty Welshman at one time exhibited himself publicly in England attired in a costume composed from top to toe of ratskins, which he had spent three years and a half in collecting. The dress was made entirely by himself. It consisted of hat, neckerchief, coat, waistcoat, trousers, tippet, gaiters and shoes. The number of rats required to complete the suit was 670. Most curious of the garments was the tippet, composed entirely of rats' tails. At one time a batch of several thousand ratskins was imported from France into England for manufacturing purposes, but they were found too small and too fine in texture to be useful.—Washington Star.

The Aromatic Clove Tree.

A peculiarity of the clove tree is that every part of it is aromatic, though the greatest strength is in the bud. Besides the buds, the stems are gathered and form an article of commerce commanding one-fifth the price of cloves, and having about the same percentage of strength. To this is due the fact that ground cloves can be purchased in the home market at a lower price than whole cloves.—Exchange.

Ready for Business.

A certain doctor who was noted for a keen eye to business was driving along the street of a country town when his horse took fright and ran away. He was thrown violently out of his trap and rendered senseless. Presently he recovered a little from his unconsciousness, and noticing the crowd which had gathered about him, asked: "What's the matter, gentlemen? Anybody hurt? I am Dr. B——. Can I be of any service?"—San Francisco Argonaut.

A HELPING HAND.

A helping hand we all may give,
If but a pleasant word to say,
And something find each day we live,
To help another on the way.

A helping hand may sow the seed
From which the fruits of goodness grow,
And to the right may gently lead
The erring from the path of woe.

A helping hand to all mankind,
Among the rich, the poor and low,
In every state of life can find
An act of kindness to bestow.

A helping hand we all may need,
When darkest sorrows leave their trace,
Some one to comfort and to lead,
To give us strength and divine grace.

A helping hand where e'er we go,
A ray of sunshine may impart,
And but a deed of kindness show
A noble and a generous heart.

A helping hand is ever near,
In passing through life's troubled tide;
When all the world seems cold and drear,
It is a never failing guide.
—Alice D. Abell in Good Housekeeping.

He Changed His Mind.

"Jack—Is it true, Harry, that you have given up all thoughts of making Maud your wife?

Harry—Well, I should say so.

Jack—That's strange; I thought you were so anxious to get her.

Harry—So I was, but I've changed my mind in that quarter. I tried to get her to give me a kiss, and she refused, but in less than ten seconds after refusing to kiss me she kissed that pug dog of hers at least a dozen times. I tell you what it is—when a woman prefers the wet nose of a dirty pug to the tidy mouth of a live man there is a screw loose somewhere, and I congratulate myself on my narrow escape.—London Tit-Bits.

The disagreeable operation of forcing liquids into the head, and the use of exciting snuffs are being superceded by Ely's Cream Balm, a cure for Catarrh and colds in the head.

I have been a great sufferer from catarrh for ten years; could hardly breathe. Some nights I could not sleep. I purchased Ely's Cream Balm and am using it freely; it is working a cure surely. I have advised several friends to use it, and with happy results in every case. It is the medicine above all others for catarrh, and is worth its weight in gold. I thank God I have found a remedy I can use with safety and that does all that is claimed for it.—B. W. Sperry, Hartford, Conn.

SAFETY IN THE MIDST OF DANGER.

This would seem a contradiction—is so, in fact, to the eye. But experience has proved its possibility. Take the case of the individual who dwells in a malarious region. A robust constitution is no certain defence against the dreaded chills. What is? Recorded testimony, covering a period little short of half a century, proves that Hostetter's Stomach Bitters is precisely this. This continent does not limit the field where the medicine has proved its efficacy. In South America, the Isthmus of Panama, Mexico, everywhere in fact where miasma-born disease takes on its most obstinate and formidable types, the Bitters is a recognized specific in illimitable demand, and prescribed by physicians of repute. Potent, too, is it in disorders of the stomach, liver and bowels, and against that destroyer, la grippe. It improves appetite and sleep, neutralizes rheumatism and kidney complaints.

"Ah, I'm saddest when I sing,"
She sang in plaintiff key.
And all the neighbors yelled—
"So are we! So are we!"

ALWAYS GIVING SATISFACTION.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS have always given satisfaction. In fifty years there has been no complaint of them. That is about their life in the United States and millions of persons have used them. There is no doubt that they have established themselves by merit alone. They cure rheumatism, dyspepsia, piles, diarrhœa, liver complaint and fevers. One or two at night on an empty stomach, for a week or two, will keep you in good form and tone up the system.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS are purely vegetable, absolutely harmless, and safe to take at any time. Sold in every drug or medicine store, either plain or sugar coated.

A feeling of dullness, languor, and depression means that your liver isn't doing its part. That means impure blood, to begin with, and all kinds of ailments in the end.

But you can stop them in advance. Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery invigorates the liver, purifies and enriches the blood, and rouses every organ into healthy action. It prevents and cures all diseases arising from a torpid liver or from impure blood. Dyspepsia, Indigestion, Biliousness, Scrofulous, Skin and Scalp Diseases — even Consumption (or Lung-scrofula), in its earlier stages, all yield to it.

The makers of the "Discovery" claim for it only what it will do. They guarantee that it will do it. If it fails to benefit or cure, in any case, they'll return the money. Nothing else that claims to purify the blood is sold in this way; which proves, no matter what dealers may offer, that nothing else can be "just as good." Therefore, don't accept a substitute.

WAS BRIEF AND BLOODY.

The Sanguinary Sea Fight off Foo-Chow.

SOME RAPID AND TERRIBLE FIGHTING.

A French Naval Officer's Account of the Awful Contest.

The present troubles in China have attracted the attention of the world to that great and populous country. What the Mongolians may achieve while warring among themselves I cannot say, but I know their worth as foemen, for I took part in the sea fight off Foo Chow as a French naval officer. What was there done and how 'twas done is the tale here told.

THE YANG-WOO.

The date is Saturday, Aug. 23, 1884; the place, near the mouth of the river Min; the cause of the struggle, the clashing desires of France and China to rule in Annam and Tonquin. Early on the morning of the day mentioned the French commander, Admiral Courbet, informed the consuls, foreign residents and the commanders of the different men-of-war belonging to friendly nations that at 1:30 p. m. he would open fire on the Chinese fleet and all government property within reach of his guns. This was done to give neutrals time to disembark their men and protect their property and that of their countrymen.

During the forenoon the French prepared for action. The fleet consisted of the cruisers Duguay-Trouin, Villars, d'Estaing, the war sloop Volta and the gunboats Lynx, Aspic and Vipere. Their topmasts were housed, revolving cannon glittered from the tops, and the men relieved each other at the guns by watches. The Chinese fleet comprised the armored cruiser Yang-Woo, the war sloops Foo-Poo, Chi-Ain, Fei-Yen, Chaing-Wei, Fuh-Sing, Yu-Sing, the troopers Yang-Paon and Chun-Hing, and the gunboats Chin-Shing and Fuh-Shing, and sixteen war junks. No sound was audible in the harbor until two bells were heard striking on board of all the vessels at anchor. Then a large man-of-war steamed slowly up the river toward Foo-Chow. The tricolor flew from her main gaff, and in golden letters at the bow was the name Triomphante. The arrival of this redoubtable ironclad had been anxiously awaited by the French, and hardly had signals been exchanged between her and the flagship when the death knell was heard chiming from the gunboat Lynx, followed by a flash, a puff of smoke and the ominous report of a Hotchkiss gun. The battle had begun!

In another moment terrific thunders issued from about thirty ships and many shore batteries, making the air quiver and smite one's face and the hills to tremble. Dense clouds of smoke settled upon the water and traveled slowly seaward in all manner of fantastic shapes before the light breeze. Along the starboard side of the mighty Duguay-Trouin could be noticed a puny craft. Suddenly nine men jumped on her iron deck, and off she darted heading straight for the most powerful of the Chinese fleet, the Yang-Woo. She was soon discovered, and a tempest of shell and shot hailed upon her deck. Nevertheless the little craft held on her way, turning neither to the right nor to the left, and apparently regardless of a fire that well might make a ship ten times her size hesitate. Her crew did not outnumber that of an ordinary fishing smack, but they were there for duty, and the thunderous shell or shot could not make them swerve. The tiny vessel, though literally pelted with iron hail, held her way up to within 200 yards of the enemy. Then rang out in tones so firm and clear that they might be heard from side to side of the river the words "Lance" and "Renverse."

The first was the order to launch the torpedo (for the mysterious little craft was a torpedo boat), and the latter order meant to get back out of the jaws of death. At the moment the first order was given a small, oblong shaped body was projected noiselessly straight for the big ship, leaving as it went only a faint track in the water; but it moved with the accuracy of an arrow. The Celestials saw that the hated European invader had sent a deadly messenger. They were filled with terror, and instead of standing by their guns ran hither and thither jabbering and invoking their gods. The officers gave words of command recalling them to their posts, but in vain and too late. The thing was already alongside.

There was a slight tremor through the frame of the ship, then in the twinkling of an eye it seemed to the frightened sailors as if the end of the world had come. The torpedo had struck abaft midships. Then came a deafening detonation and tongues of flame leaped far above the clouds of smoke. This was the first fair test of the disastrous efficacy of the modern torpedo. What was a few moments before a stately ship, the pride of the Chinese empire, was reduced to a mass of broken timbers. After the awful explosion, the air above and around the doomed ship was peopled in a way never seen in the world before. For the spectator it was difficult to distinguish the human beings sent up by the explosion from the portions of spars and shattered planks. Indeed the limbs of many of the crew were afterward found a mile away, and some of them actually on the roofs of the pagodas lining the shore.

And as for those on board, the water came in with a rushing, doomful sound, and those who were not dead, maimed or thrown into the water clung desperately to everything they could lay hold of, crying piteously to their gods to save them. Then there was a reel, a great lurch and what remained of ship and crew went down. A great many of the Chinese officers and sailors never rose, but scores came to the surface, some of them trying to swim to land, though disabled. There were also many who were unhurt, but who could not swim, and they clung to those who could. When the American and English warships saw their plight they at once sent out a number of steam launches and rescued as many as possible.

A spirited fire was kept up on both sides. The forts along the shore and especially the water battery on Pagoda island did good work and kept the d'Estaing, Duguay-Trouin and Villars busy on the left. Suddenly there emerged from the narrow creek dividing Pagoda island from the mainland three French gunboats with the Volta, carrying Admiral Courbet in the lead. They passed the Chinese forts, forging their way ahead in the direction of the navy yard. When the brigantine Foo-Poo sighted the enemy rounding the point the dastardly crew ran their vessel on the bank and deserted her.

In the meantime the Triomphante, which hitherto had taken no part in the fight, steamed up the river. When passing the United States ship Enterprise, which with the Monocacy viewed the conflict, those on board that vessel could have heard the order given by the captain on the bridge to clear away and load the big bow-chaser. This was done and the gun fired. The huge shell sped growling through the air, striking the fort that stood on the top of the hill of Pagoda island. The order to reload was likewise heard from the bridge of the Triomphante when the Chinese war sloop Chaing-Wei was seen to maneuver up the river.

Once more the thunder of the gun filled the air, and when the smoke cleared away the spectators even from the shore could see the result. The ball had struck the vessel in the stern and, ripping up her decks, passed out under the bowsprit. Many of the crew at once jumped into the lowered boats and tried to pull away, but before they succeeded the brave Chinese commander and his first lieutenant riddled them with shot and sunk them. Then resuming his attentions to the French, for a few moments the captain with his remnant of a crew kept up the fighting and tried to get near the d'Estaing, evidently with the intention of blowing up that and his own ship. But a broadside from the Villars settled the fate of the unfortunate Chaing-Wei and her gallant captain. Fire broke out in her bows and she sank fast, but before she gave that last roll which sailors know so well, her big pivot Armstrong gun sent hissing through the air a final defiance. The ships which had not been sunk now drifted down the river enveloped in flames and exploding with the sound of awful thunder peals whenever the fire reached their magazines.

Meanwhile out of the melee from the midst of debris and drowning men came the hero of the day, the little torpedo boat. It was plain that she was in distress, and when the relief boat of the Enterprise went to her assistance the nine Spartans that comprised her crew were found stripped to the waist, begrimed with powder and covered with blood. The lieutenant in command was lying wounded below. The surgeon from the Enterprise went on board and dressed the injuries of the officer and also of a seaman who was badly hurt, after which they were advised to go on board their ship. The officer cordially thanked the surgeon, but declined to resign the post of duty, and as for the seaman, he swore that he would not desert his commander.

Within twelve minutes twenty-six warships, the pride of China and her mainstay upon the seas, had been wiped out as utterly as if they were so many bubbles. It is no wonder that from every pagoda ashore came the wailing of men and women, that people groveled in the temples before their idols, thinking that the end of the world had come.

As soon as the smoke cleared away it could be seen that the French ships, unscathed by the encounter, were reducing things to order. Indeed in a few minutes everything was as shipshape on board as if not a shot had been fired.

Now what was Admiral Courbet's next step? He had annihilated the enemy's fleet, but the government factories, the navy yards, magazines and docks still remained, and the river shores by which he had to pass out to sea were dotted with batteries, every one of which bristled with guns. Many of these fortifications were built by French engineers several years before; their sides were of thick granite and were impregnable to the assaults of old guns. But they were useless now against the merciless onslaught of the modern French ordnance and went down as if they had been made of chalk. The Chinese stood by their guns as long as the walls held up, then they ran in terror to the hills. Fort after fort were destroyed in this manner along down the river.

For four days the thunders of the French ships were not hushed. On almost every height was a fortification, each of which opened fire as the fleet passed down the river, the mouth of which was thirty-five miles distant. The course was literally sown with submarine mines, and if a vessel touched one of them it meant her destruction. The French officers, however, knew too much about naval warfare for the Chinese, and took their ships along in safety.

As to the casualties I may say that the Chinese themselves put their losses at 3,000 killed. The loss on the French side was only 16 men.

While I do not approve of war, I cannot deny from what I have seen in the Tonquin that it has its picturesque side. A man would never be able to forget how the skies seemed to be lit up from the zenith to the horizon on those murky nights after our ships had shelled and destroyed the navy yard, the arsenals and other government properties along our route. We learned, too, but I know not how true the story may be, that some of the sailors heard Chinese men and women wailing by the shores and praying deliverance from an invader whom they regarded as a scourge from the gods.

LIEUT. F. DE THUMMEL-CLOTH.

He Wanted to Cross.

Some men get through the world so easily that the wonder is that they are willing to stay in it. The field for their brilliant minds on this earth is too limited. A man came out from a theater the other evening and stood on the sidewalk. "Number of your carriage, sir?" asked the man who looks after this part of the theater. "Ninety-six," was the answer, and the man bawled ninety-six, and cleared a way for the carriage to come up, but at that the "smart" man remarked coolly that he only wanted an opening made through the carriages so that he could get across the street. His successful ruse made trouble for half a dozen people who did have carriages waiting for them.—New York Tribune.

RIO JANEIRO.

A Pen Picture of the Capital of Brazil.

LOW BUILDINGS AND NARROW STREETS.

Its Beautiful Public Parks.—Houses Without Chimneys.

The public buildings of the capital of Brazil are not as imposing as those of Washington. The palace of the late emperor, the houses of parliament, the public library, the hobitel of Imprensa Nacional—National Press—are commodious but not striking structures. The Portuguese were commonplace architects, and one sees degraded monastic architecture displayed in all old public buildings, whether lay or clerical. The modern structures, like the custom house and the new exchange, Praca do Commercio, are not classical, but conglomerate abortions, like the New York postoffice, or state, war and navy building at Washington. The late imperial palace, Sao Christao, has a commanding position, and the views therefrom are unrivaled but, the approach to it is rendered lugubrious by the hundreds of buzzards that haunt the locality.

The business portion of Rio is solidly built, the structures are low and have a squatty appearance. The walls are concrete, broken stone and cement, and plastered on the outside or faced with tile. The streets are so narrow that two vehicles cannot pass. Indeed, when a Rio Jehu comes dashing down Rua Ouvidor, the fashionable shopping street, the pedestrian has to seek shelter in the shop doors. Vehicles are by police regulation, compelled to go down one street and up another.

A few years ago it was a rare sight to see a lady on the streets without an attendant—usually a slipshod female slave. Occasionally now one sees the matron or daughters of one of the old time families out with their late slave duennas following; but, as a rule, ladies go alone in the streets and ride in the street cars. The common name for street car is "bond." When Philadelphians built the first street railway in Rio they issued "bonds" as securities, and the new word was applied by the people to the cars.

The greater part of the new dwelling houses of the city are two stories. The first story is a basement containing store rooms, servants' quarters and bath rooms. The second has the parlor, sleeping apartments, dining room and kitchen. The parlor occupies the whole front of the house. Then comes the sleeping rooms, with a narrow hallway between connecting the parlor with the dining room. From the dining room one goes through a pantry to the kitchen. The entrances are from the side to the parlor and to a hall back of the dining room.

The furnishing of the parlors is uniform. The floors have three rugs, one in the center and two at the sides. A sofa and four chairs at right angles thereto stood on each side of the room, a center table in the middle of the room, a piano in one corner, two or three rocking chairs about the center table. Furniture is rarely upholstered, cane bottomed Vienna bent wood sofas, chairs and rockers prevailing. The dining room floor is usually sanded.

The houses have no chimneys, and the kitchens, until recently, had no ranges. The cooking apparatus was, and now often is, a raised platform with a place for a charcoal fire—something like an old New England arrangement for boiling maple sap, only on a smaller scale. The vent for smoke and fumes is directly through the side of the wall against which the furnace is built. The bathrooms are luxurious; tile floors and a huge vat, often 8 by 6 feet, built up with brick and cement, and lined inside and out with tiles. They are more like swimming baths than bath tubs.

Ice is confined to restaurants as a rule. The caraffe—an unglazed classical shaped potter's ware bottle, and evaporation of the water through the pores—furnishes a far healthier "cooler" than our ice abomination.

There are several palatial private residences. That of the late Visconde Nova Friburgo cost over $1,000,000. The houses of all the rich people are large, the rooms spacious, with lofty ceilings, but rarely with more than two stories for living purposes. They are surrounded by grounds exquisitely adorned by skillful gardeners, containing a bewildering variety of tropical shrubbery, plants and flowers, and frequently avenues of the graceful and impressive royal palms. The rose flourishes to perfection and is a great favorite.

Some of the public squares are gems of beauty. Passeo Public is exquisite. The Praca de Acclamation, where the first emperor was acclaimed and the second and last, poor Dom Pedro Segundo, was deposed, is a large square and effectively adorned. There are many interesting excursions to surrounding places, where enchanting views can be had of the mountains, sea and bay. The peak of Corcovano is reached by a railway with maximum grades of 32 per cent. The view from the top is unequaled by any other in the world. Toward the ocean the wall face is sheer down for over a thousand feet. The white line of breaking surf is separated from the base by a narrow strip of green. The city lies below, and one looks down upon it from an elevation of 2,300 feet.

Across the bay in the dim distance the jagged peaks of the Organ mountains seem to pierce the sky. The huge, upheaved rock, with precipitous sides and broad, flat top, called Gauca, and the conical peaks of the Two Brothers and Tijuca mountain, are to the south, and through grand notches are glimpses of the sea.

Projecting mountain spurs divide the city into several sections and give a diversified effect to the view below. It is in keeping with all the rest of the glorious panorama.

Tijuca mountain affords another and different panoramic view and several distinct and unique bits of views. Then there are lovely waterfalls on the mountain side and the Floresta, where one can walk for miles through a blending of natural and cultivated tropical forests.—New York Times.

Reclaiming Sahara.

French colonization and development companies are making encouraging progress in creating new oases in the Algerian part of the desert of Sahara. One company have sunk nine artesian wells, reaching water bearing strata at a depth of 230 feet, giving a steady flow of about five thousand gallons per minute. The water is brackish, and unfit for drinking, but it answers very well for irrigation. This company have about fifty thousand palm trees under cultivation, the date palm being the principal variety. Henna and madder are also cultivated profitably, and experiments are in progress with cotton, flax, tobacco, grapevines, wheat and barley. Rye grass and lucern grow abundantly, the latter especially flourishing in the palm tree plantations. This company began operations in 1882, and they now have upwards of nine hundred acres of productive land reclaimed from the desert, watered by twenty-five miles of irrigating canals. These are very interesting experiments, and it is to be hoped they will be commercially successful, if not extremely profitable.—Science.

The Man from Texas Speaks.

"We don't pa'ley long with murderers out in our state," said a solemn looking man in the Broad Street station the other day.

"What state is that?" I asked.

"Texas," he replied. "We jist give a man a fair trial an thar it ends. If he is acquitted, all right. An if he's convicted he hangs."

"That so?"

"Yes, suh. It's very seldom we let 'em escape us. Jist befoah I came east I saw a man convicted in a peculiar way."

"Ah! You don't say. Let me have the story, will you?"

"It was an ordinary case. Jake Saunders stole a hoss, an when Gib Welsh, the deputy sheriff, tried to nab him Jake pinged him. He was arrested, an the prosecutin attorney made out a fine case 'gin' him. He had the thing all his way, cose Jake's lawyer couldn't produce anythin in defense, and we all thought it was sure hang for Saunders when his attorney got up to argy. By thunder! I never heard a man talk so much in all my life. Hour after hour, suh, he talked, till the jedge, the jury, prosecutin attorney, prisoner an everybody else got tired listenin to him, an one by one fell asleep."

"What! Oh, say"——

"Yes, suh. They fell asleep one by one; but still Jake's lawyer spoke on, beggin and pleadin for his client's life, till he had talked about thirteen hours."

"Thirteen hours?"

"Yes, suh. 'Pon my honah. Well, as I was sayin, he talked thirteen hours, an then when he quit a cou't officer went 'roun an woke up the jedge, jury and attorneys. It didn't take the prosecutin attorney long to sum up, an the jedge delivered his charge in a few words. Then the jury retired. They were out only five minutes"——

"And they convicted Saunders, of course?"

"No, suh. They acquitted him and convicted his lawyer. An, believe me or not, suh, they hung him that same night."

And, believe me or not, dear reader, that Texan didn't even smile.—Philadelphia Press.

A Mohammedan Evasion.

According to one of the tenets of the Mohammedan religion it is a sin to make a picture of any living thing. The elaborate decorations of the palaces and mosques of the east are almost exclusively made up of ingeniously interlaced geometric designs, arabesques or flowers, intermixed with sentences of the Koran.

There is a belief among Mussulmans that at the day of judgment Allah will demand that the artist who has made the image of a living thing shall endow that image with life, and that failing to do this the artist will be sent to perdition for his sin.

A gentleman who visited a mosque in Algiers found that the tiles with which the building is decorated, which are very old and beautiful, are adorned with flights of birds. He expressed much surprise at this and asked if the command against such representation were a modern edict.

"Oh, no," answered the pious Algerian to whom he addressed the question. "These are not pictures of living birds."

"But they are painted as if flying across the tiles," the other said in some astonishment.

"Yes," the Mussulman replied, "but do you not see that about the neck of each there is a fine black line? That is to show that the artist painted only dead birds, and the command of the Koran is not violated."—Youth's Companion.

Colonel Ethan Allen's Sword.

The sword which Colonel Ethan Allen carried when he demanded the surrender of Fort Ticonderoga "in the name of the great Jehovah and the Continental congress" is, by gift and inheritance, the personal property of a young newspaper man of Jackson, Mich., Hannibal Allen Hopkins. The sword is an old fashioned blade, nicked and venerable, twenty-seven inches long and slightly curved. The handle measures seven inches, making the total length of the weapon thirty-four inches. The handle is of bone or horn.

The mounting is of silver, washed with gold, the latter being partially worn off. A dog's head of silver forms the end of the handle, and from this to the guard runs a silver chain. On one of the silver bands of the scabbard the name, "Ethan Allen," is engraved in large letters; on another band, "E. Brasher, maker, N. York," and on still another, in script, "Martin Vosburg, 1775." Why this name appears no one knows.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

The Unexpected Guest.

If there is any annoying thing in the life of a housewife, it is the arrival of a guest, by invitation of the husband, notice of which had not previously been given by the aforesaid husband. Under such circumstances much good taste and consideration must needs be shown on all sides. For instance, I heard of such a case where, when the husband and his guest arrived, it was to find the wife ill in bed, where she had retired after preparing an exceedingly plain meal consisting of codfish, baked potatoes, bread and butter and tea. The wife nerved herself to leave her bed and preside at the meal, and all hands behaved exactly as though everything had transpired according to previous arrangement and mutual consultation. I'll warrant the husband and wife had an interview on the subject later in the day, and I am certain that both agreed that their guest was a perfect gentleman.—Detroit Free Press.

Honesty versus Rascality.

There is no greater fallacy than that of the superior practical character of rascality. Often, indeed, it gains a temporary advantage. Honesty is often drowsy and very lazy; but when it awakes and stirs it is the most practical of all forces. Among the pure drops of wisdom that fall in proverbs from the accumulated experience of ages, none is purer than that Honesty is the best policy. You call it a mean motive of conduct, but it is no meaner an appeal than that of the familiar Christian exhortation, Be good and you will be happy. It is primarily not a rule or a motive, it is the simple statement of a truth, and Tweed illustrates it as plainly as John Jay.—George William Curtis in Harper's.

A Bad Dog.

Two fashionable ladies were conversing a few days ago, when one of them said there was a very dangerous dog in her neighborhood.

"Has he bitten anybody?" asked one of the ladies.

"Yesterday he caught a little pig by the ear and bit it terribly."

"Is that so? If he is that kind of a dog I'm not going to let my children play in that neighborhood."

"Nor mine either."—Texas Siftings.

How often we hear it said of some sweet, matronly dame, "How much handsomer Mrs. —— is now than when she was a girl," or of some intellectual woman, "What a fine, noble face!" but who can find anything attractive in a faded, dressed up doll?

OLD TIME FIREARMS.

The Matchlock Guns used by the Puritans.

COMPLICATED AND UNWIELDY WEAPONS.

Almost Useless in Rainy Weather.—Crude Construction.

The precise population of New England, either Indian or white at the time of Philip's war, cannot be stated; but, for the purpose of war, it may be said that the forces on one side and on the other were almost equal. At that time the Indians were as well used to firearms as the whites, but the firelock of those days was but an inefficient weapon, compared with the musket of later times or with the rifle of today.

It seems certain that in Europe flintlocks had been introduced before this time; but on the whole the concurrence of evidence shows that such locks were not used in the civil war in England, and that both the king's party and the Puritans still relied on the matchlock. The form of this can be readily explained to any person who has seen the old flintlock of the present century. A hammer, a good deal larger than the hammer which afterward held the flint, but quite like, had a screw which tightened or loosened the hold which two pieces of iron had upon a match.

Each soldier was obliged to carry some yards of this match with him, and when the battle began he lighted the piece of this match which was fixed in the hammer of the gun. A pan which held powder, exactly as the pan of a flintlock afterward did, was in front of the hammer, with a cover projecting from which a sort of horn ran up nearly vertical, to be opened by the hammer when the soldier pulled the trigger. The fire of the match then communicated with the powder, and the gun went off.

This was a sufficiently complicated way in which men should go into battle, perhaps in a wilderness, where even the procuring of fire at that time was attended with some difficulty. The accounts of skirmishes of those times are full of occasions when a sudden shower put a stop to the whole battle. This is because the fire of the matches was extinguished by the rain.

To change this rather clumsy lock into a flintlock simply required that a flint of sufficient size should be screwed into the hammer in the place made for the match. The flint, then, striking upon the cover of the pan, made a spark which fell, at the moment the pan opened, into the powder. Eventually these locks were made with great precision, and so that the gun missed fire very seldom.

I have no doubt that one and another soldier in Philip's war found for himself that a flint Indian arrowhead, screwed in the place of his match, could be made to answer the purpose of firing the powder much more readily than the match itself could do. A similar invention, however, as I have said, had already been made in Europe, so that it is thought that flintlock guns have been found in France as early as 1640.

In 1672, however, just before the war with Philip began, the law of Massachusetts and the provision made for her soldiers still required the use of the matchlock.—Edward Everett Hale in Chautauquan.

Curious Notices.

The following ambiguous notice was posted up, early in the present century, for the information and guidance of the dwellers on certain property in the county of Kent: "Notice is hereby given that the Marquis of Camden (on account of the backwardness of the harvest) will not shoot himself, nor any of his tenants, till the 14th of September."

A similar notice, as regards ambiguity, once made its appearance near Brentford. It read: "Ten shillings reward—Any person found trespassing on these lands or damaging these fences on conviction will receive the above reward. Dogs poisoned." If the magistrates were at all lenient thereabout it might have become a profitable occupation trespassing or breaking down fences.—London Tit-bits.

An Aboriginal Way of Getting a Bride.

Among some of the aboriginal races of America the would be bridegroom sometimes experienced considerable difficulty in winning a bride.

There was a matrimonial mound on which the priest stood, around which the swain had to chase the fair one. If he was not a favored suitor the lady generally managed to make the circuit three times before being overtaken, in which case she was not compelled to marry her pursuer. How amusing it would be in this country to see a fat old bachelor (that is, if minus of riches) chasing a nimble maiden round a hillock.—San Francisco Examiner.

A Poplar That Does Not Seed.

It does not seem to be generally known that the Lombardy poplar never seeds; it is simply a variety of another poplar, and has to be increased wholly from cuttings. The pollen bearing form, so far as known, is not in this country. The plant is wholly pistillate.—Meehan's Monthly.

TALENTS IN A BARREL.

The Way in Which a Persistent Writer Got His Place Among the Stars.

A good many years ago an American magazinist, whose name is now famous, sent his first manuscript to a magazine. It was rejected. After a time he sent another, which was also rejected, and next month another, which met the same fate.

Instead of being crushed by all this ill fortune he began to send in two or three manuscripts every month, consisting of essays, sketches, poems, romances and tales of adventure, but not one of them all was accepted by the editor of the magazine in the course of the half year during which the patient writer kept up his merry labors.

This writer, however, did not become discouraged, but continued to send more and more manuscript to the office of the magazine, and at last they were thrown into a waste paper barrel near the editorial table, without being looked at, for the editor had become disgruntled over the scribbler's pertinacity. The receptacle in which the manuscripts were kept came to be known in the office as "——'s barrel," and every month, till the end of the year, he continued to add to its stock. The editor had ceased to take any interest in this paper stock, or in its growth, or in the barrel, but often told humorous stories about it to his literary visitors, who laughed at them, as a matter of course.

One of these visitors, after laughing at a story about the barrel and the prolific contributor to it, got the notion that there must be "something in" a writer of such extraordinary pertinacity. He took out of the barrel a manuscript, which happened to be a poem, looked at it, liked its opening, grew enthusiastic as he continued to read it, and when he had finished its perusal glorified the writer of it, and told the editor of the magazine that this was a grand work which ought to be given to the world at once. It was printed in next month's magazine, to the amazement of its writer.

The popularity of the new poet was soon made manifest, and further productions of his pen were now in demand. The old barrel was ransacked. The essays and other things there were eagerly seized by the editor of the magazine, and were printed month after month.

The writer of the rejected manuscripts began to hear of his renown. High remuneration was offered to him for his handiwork. His name is now known far and wide.

He has for years past been enjoying the rewards of that extraordinary pertinacity and patience which he displayed when he first strove to gain admission into the literary field.—New York Sun.

A Lincoln Story.

The great public receptions with their vast rushing multitudes pouring past him to shake hands, Mr. Lincoln rather enjoyed; they were not a disagreeable task to him, and he seemed surprised when people commiserated him upon them. He would shake hands with thousands of people, seemingly unconscious of what he was doing, murmuring some monotonous salutation as they went by, his eye dim, his thoughts far withdrawn; then suddenly he would see some familiar face—his memory for faces was very good—and his eye would brighten and his whole form grow attentive; he would greet the visitor with a hearty grasp and a ringing word and dismiss him with a cheery laugh that filled the blue room with infectious good nature.

Many people armed themselves with an appropriate speech to be delivered on these occasions, but unless it was compressed into the smallest possible space it never got utterance; the crowd would jostle the peroration out of shape. If it were brief enough and hit the president's fancy it generally received a swift answer. One night an elderly gentleman from Buffalo said, "Up our way, we believe in God and Abraham Lincoln," to which the president replied, shoving him along the line, "My friend, you are more than half right."—John Hay in Century.

Buying Flowers Cheaply.

Clever men about town whose means do not enable them to disregard small economies have discovered that flowers are not necessarily the exclusive luxury of the rich. The wise young man of slender purse does not buy flowers of the florist whose windows delight the eyes of promenaders, but purchases either at the street corner or of modest dealers who display their wares in out of the way cellars. The difference in price according to location is astonishing.

Roses, for example, bring from $1 to $5 a hundred in the wholesale market at the foot of East Thirty-fourth street. If you buy at retail of a fashionable florist you find the price advanced to at least 75 cents a dozen, and from that up to $2 or $2.50 a dozen. If, however, you know the haunts of the more modest flower venders you may buy quite as fine roses at from 50 cents to $1.25 per dozen. Saturday is a good day to buy roses, because the florists do not care to risk carrying their perishable stock over Sunday.—New York Star.

In for a Good Time.

Ethel (surprised) — Why, Carrie! What are you having the house decorated for?

Carrie—You see, ma and pa are away, and we intend to make the most of their absence. To-night we'll have a dance, to-morrow a card party, next night prayer meeting—they'll be home then.—Judge.

CARRIED MESSAGES.

Boys Who Have Acquired Fame and Wealth.

ANDREW CARNEGIE'S EARLY AMBITION.

Millionaire's Who Were Youngsters Together.—Their Careers.

The story of five messenger boys begins in the early days of telegraphy. In a dingy office in Pittsburg, about 1848, Andrew Carnegie, Henry W. Oliver, Robert Pitcairn, Major William C. Moreland and David McCargo were messengers. It is said that they took the opposite of other boys and spent their spare moments in learning useful lessons. Andrew Carnegie is the oldest of the lot, and he was the smartest, leading all in learning how to telegraph. He was one of the first operators in the country to learn to take the Morse system by sound, which in those days was considered a remarkable achievement. It did not take Thomas A. Scott long to snatch Mr. Carnegie from the telegraph office in Pittsburg into his office as private secretary when the great railroad genius took charge of the Pittsburg end of the road. The education the young Scotchman received from a greater mind lifted him from a secretary's seat into the place of division superintendent when Mr. Scott was made vice president of the railroad. The industry, the subtle cunning and watching faith of Scott taught him to lay his lines in other directions than watching the divisions of a railroad, and Scott helped him. His place gave him the opportunity to look into other lines of industry, and he drove a drift into an iron mill. His pickax was not large, but his cunning and thrift made up for the size of his ax. J. Edgar Thomson, who was the president of the Pennsylvania railroad, then gave a great name and money to the works now dominated by Mr. Carnegie. At that time Colonel Scott was a power in the nation as well as the railroad, and Carnegie began to gather wealth.

"My ambition in those days," he said recently, "was to write for newspapers. I took in material in that direction whenever it was possible. I haunted the public library in Alleghany, and caught on to the fact that a distinction was made by the attendants between the poor boys and the sons of well to do parents. It made me indignant. I wrote my first public letter to the board of control, and a change was ordered. This result more than ever resolved me to follow journalism, but an accident drifted me elsewhere, and I became a manufacturer."

Thrift and industry were the derricks which lifted Harry W. Oliver out of the telegraph chair next to Mr. Carnegie, and made him a clerk for a big iron firm. He is an Irishman, with a head full of cunning about the business economies of life. It did not take long for him to realize the possibilities of the iron trade, and one day a slick working block and tackle hoisted him out of his seat at the desk in the big firm's workshop and landed him in a business that has since grown to be one of the greatest concerns in the world. He has grown very rich, and one railroad and seven manufacturing concerns now feel the touch of his hand.

Another Scotchman of the famous five is Robert Pitcairn, who sits in the seat once occupied by Colonel Tom Scott and Mr. Carnegie. He went from a telegraph chair into the railroad business, and he has been a master in all the best conditions of railroad life. He is many times a millionaire, but he lives for his railroad, although interested, like Mr. Oliver, in many large manufacturing enterprises. He does the work of about three men every day, and takes recreation only when he wants to talk with a big friend or indulge with his countrymen in the melodies of Scotland. He has denied himself promotion many times, because he likes to cling to the location where he began as a messenger boy and has had so many triumphs.

The fourth member of the group is David McCargo, the general manager of the Alleghany railroad. His strong Scotch character lifted him into big railway concerns early. He left the telegraph office soon after the other boys and took a place on the railway.

"Think of it," said Major William P. Moreland, the last, but not least, of the famous five. "I stood at the key with Carnegie, Oliver, Pitcairn, McCargo, and heard the first message pass over the wires that was sent between the north and south. James D. Reid, who was general superintendent; David Brooks, now living in Philadelphia, and Jackson Duncan, of Cincinnati, had charge of the experiment. We had to work on short circuits in those days, and we thought it was impossible to send a message to New York from New Orleans. Brooks and Reid walked over and inspected the line from the Crescent City to Pittsburg. After arriving here and assuring themselves that the line was perfect, the effort was ordered and every telegraph operator on the line, and in fact the whole country, was waiting in suspense to know the success or failure of the effort. Every magnet was adjusted, and every electrician on the line stood at his key listening for the result. At the signal New York called Philadelphia, the Quaker City signaled Harrisburg, and then in quick succession Pittsburg, Cincinnati, Louisville and New Orleans were opened to the metropolis. No one drew a breath scarcely until the tick came, and in a minute an unbroken message was sent between the north and south. That may seem primitive in these days, when there is no measuring electric power; but then it was the talk of the nation. This is a bit of untold history; but I shall never forget that hour."—New York Sun.

INDEPENDENCE, CAL.
FRIDAY, JUNE 3 1892

Judging from the tone of the Republican press the "grand old party" has in Robert T. Lincoln an unexceptionable candidate, provided there is nobody else to nominate. He is not likely to fill a long felt want, however.

Deeming, the murderer who has just been executed in Australia, was arrested in March, tried in April and convicted and executed in May. Had the murderer been arrested and tried in this State under precisely similar circumstances the probabilities are that he would not have been tried for two or three years, and then, if he had money, it is doubtful if he would have been convicted at all. Our management of criminal laws does not exhibit us to the world in the best possible light.

The Chronicle sees a hopeful sign in the fact that a white man has been convicted of murder and sentenced to be hung for killing a Chinaman. There may be a ray of hope in this event, but there is room for a whole burst of sunshine by the hanging of a score or more of the white men and women murderers now confined in the the various jails of the State, awaiting acquittal by judicial juggling.

At the Democratic convention of the state of Kentucky held at Louisville last week, the following appeared in the platform in regard to the currency question:

"We demand a sound and stable currency composed of, or reducible to gold and silver coin. We declare it to be the mission of the Democratic party to preserve a parity in the values of gold and silver dollars and provide means by appropriate legislation for the free coinage of silver without detriment to any business interest and debt-ridden people."

Without at all going into the partizan politics of the campaign, we desire to say that this is about right. It is a conservative course equally distant from the monometalists on one side and that of the inflationists on the other. It declares for our enlarged currency circulation, but demands that there be a solid basis underneath our currency which will give it stability.

Secretary Blaine, taking his cue from Actor Sullivan, has submitted himself to examination by Dr. Pepper of Philadelphia, and that famous medico has given him a clean bill of health. He says that the Maine statesman is physically sound, and his friends need now feel no alarm about his condition. This, of course, means that he can make the presidential trip with perfect safety. It is now in order for the friends of the little man from Indiana to submit him to an examination by the Harrison family physician. One can imagine the frightful character and appalling number of organic ailments such an examination would develop in the victim of the Mulligan letters. Why, he would present such a wreck that even the proprietors of the universal panacea would recoil from the task of curing him with their remedies for all "the ills that flesh is heir to." Sullivan and Blaine will now enter upon their respective contests with a confidence that can only fail from causes outside of themselves.

Balfour's local government bill passed the house of commons last week by a very slender majority. Gladstone opposed its passage in a very powerful speech, in which he showed that if accepted by the Irish people it would place them in a disadvantageous relation as respects both the English and Scotch constituencies of the British empire. This is a strong point, and will undoubtedly and rightfully count for a great deal with the Irish people. When the infamous act of union was passed even Lord Castlereagh placated the pride of the Irish people by constituting the new power thus created as the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, a title which is retained to the present day. There is little danger of the Irish people accepting anything less than home rule. Lord Salisbury's government is in a desperate strait, and the coming election will relegate it to the limbo of things lost upon earth. The grand old man has only to live a little to be master of the situation; and Ireland has only to wait a little to be mistress of her own destinies.

TO A YOUNG GIRL.

The stars' untarnished gold gleams in the meshes of thy hair,
The heavenly hue of April's blue lives in thy wondering eyes,
The lips which kiss to crimson the pale clouds that flush the skies
Have pressed thine own, and lingered lightly on thy cheeks so fair:
No wave of passion on thy heart hath sobbed in sensuous sighs,
Nor hath ambition brought to thy smooth brow one touch of care.
The gods, with gifts supernal and supreme, have dowered thee,
Youth, purity and beauty thine, a precious legacy.

—Daniel E. O'Sullivan in Southern Bivouac.

THE GHOST.

My father's farm was fully eleven miles, over a lonely and deserted road, from the little town of B——, and almost midway between the two points above lay the old Sharp farm, desolate and run to weeds, simply because the owner, for reasons hereafter to be given, was forced to content himself from year to year with the grazing it afforded his cattle and the few meager loads of hay saved from the neglected meadows.

The former proprietor, old Jacob Sharp, or Lame Jake, as he was more frequently called by reason of an unfortunate physical deformity, known to the doctors, I believe, as equino-varus, and commonly as clubfoot, had taken a notion a few years before to hang himself to a rafter in the old barn, and by that little act had completely ruined the reputation of one of the best and most fertile holdings in the country.

From whatever source originated, weird and uncanny stories soon began to circulate respecting the old homestead, the purport of which were that poor old Lame Jake, who had been so impatient to get out of the world, was now equally anxious to get back, but having foolishly disposed of his carnal covering to gratify the whim of an idle moment, he was now compelled in revisiting thus the glimpses of the moon, to restrict himself to such hours and places as the native modesty of any proper minded ghost would be most apt to suggest.

Many and marvelous were the legends which the "auld slashers" of the country, as the Great Antiquary would call them, were in the habit of relating to such juvenile and feminine ears as were most readily captivated thereby; and many and many a night have I seen my sister and younger brothers go to bed with eyes like saucers after an evening's seance with one of these raconteurs.

But, as the New Light of Asia has it, that is another story.

One tenant of the place had fifty bushels of wheat carefully winnowed one night, old Jake being distinctly seen by a member of the family, whom the noise of the mill had aroused, standing in the time honored white nightgown and surrounded by a bluish halo, industriously turning the crank; but while he was congratulating himself that these visitations promised to be of a Brownie rather than of a Goblin character the next night, outrageous to relate, the winnowed wheat was just as carefully mixed with an equal quantity of rye from another bin, the scandalous proceedings being celebrated with flashings of light, the most outlandish racket and discordant peals of unearthly laughter.

These financial losses and annoyances, while bad enough in their way, might still have been struggled against for some time had not his ghostship taken it into his pneumatic head to begin a series of domiciliary visits threatening more directly the unfortunate man's personal peace and welfare.

A bright glare, emanating from some particular room, would convey to the startled inmates the idea that the house was in flames; and a rush being made thither the light would disappear in an instant, to the accompaniment of loud groans and laughter, rattling of furniture and pattering of ghostly footsteps down the hallways.

Frequently the farmer during sleep, usually when most worried, would find himself suddenly and disgracefully fired out of bed by some invisible agency; windows and crockery were smashed, bells rung at midnight, and on one occasion his wife had the wits nearly frightened out of her by finding her lord sleeping one morning by her side, his hands folded on his breast and two pennies placed in orthodox fashion over his eyes.

These happenings, the reader will easily conceive, had the effect of limiting his occupancy of the Sharp messuage strictly to the period of his lease, and some three or four others who succeeded him made equally short stays.

Others complained most of the trouble they had with their cattle. Horses securely stalled began about midnight to raise a most terrific uproar, and if not promptly liberated would invariably thrash down the stable door and be found next morning huddled together in the farthest corner of the pasture. Frequently one would be found bearing the marks of the saddle and other evidences of a severe night journey, although in such instances, in justice to old Jake, the fact that one of the boys was courting a squire's daughter in a neighboring county may have borne some relation to the phenomenon.

Weird lights burning through the chinks of the barn and about the premises were so common to the neighbors that when the boys and girls happened to be belated at a dance, a husking or an apple paring they told their parents they came home by the light of old Sharp's lantern.

I am not going in this age of divided skirts and long distance telephones to put myself on record as the man that saw Jake Sharp's ghost; but what I did see and hear the night I slept in that old barn—well, I'm going to tell you about it.

I had been to B—— and was returning somewhat late. The night was dark and starless, and the faint flashes of lightning which began in the west kept increasing in frequency and brilliancy behind me till, just as the old Sharp gables loomed up from the blackness before me, the storm I had been apprehending burst upon me like the opening of a waterspout.

Never before had I seen such a downfall. The rain descended in one solid sheet, and the earth fairly shook with the continuous roll of the thunder. The lightning was fierce and vivid.

Under the circumstances there was nothing to do but to take shelter, for a time at least, in the old barn; and you can easily imagine with what a creepy sensation I heard the rickety doors creak on their rusty hinges as I swung them open and got my team as quickly as possible under the leaky cover.

Striking a match just to get my bearings, I unbitted the horses and supplied them with hay, of which there was a quantity in one of the mows; and then lighting my pipe, that incomparable solace of the solitary, I began to take stock of my surroundings.

The storm showing no sign of abatement, the thunder crashes following each other in quick succession, and the lightning playing vividly through the chinks and broken shingles, I began with as much stoicism as I could assume making preparations for my present comfort.

Selecting a dry spot in the haymow, I removed some of my wet outer garments, and with the aid of horse blankets succeeded in improvising a tolerable bed; but not, I assure you, with the remotest idea of sleep.

Nevertheless, in an hour or so, the thunder and lightning having almost died away, although the rain still came down in torrents; worn out with fatigue and soothed by the odor of the hay, I fell into a deep and quiet slumber.

How long I slept I know not, but I was suddenly wakened by the snorting and stamping of the horses, and starting up, became immediately conscious of a faint bluish light floating in the air directly over the seat I had so lately occupied.

It resembled no other light I had ever seen, but seemed to be simply a ball of bluish or amethyst colored fire, which circled about through the air with a queer undulating movement. It imparted to me as I looked at it a strange feeling of dizziness and nausea.

While I sat staring, fascinated by the mysterious light, I was horrified to hear a long, low groan, coming seemingly from the body of the wagon, followed almost instantly by the sound of my own name, repeated as distinctly as I had ever heard it in my life—"Joe! Joe!"

With the cold perspiration beginning to break from every pore I sprang to my feet, and as I did so the light floated slowly up to the rafters and disappeared, while a low, rattling laugh echoed through the darkness.

All doubts as to the truth of the stories I had heard about the haunted barn were now pretty fully dismissed. I felt that I was fairly in for it.

By the feeble glare of my matches, which only seemed to intensify the darkness, I strove to penetrate the wall of blackness about me, but not a thing could I see.

My heart was chilled, my blood frozen in my veins, and I was only prevented from dashing open the doors and escaping into the more friendly darkness without by the simple fact that terror—shall I say it?—had rendered me incapable of motion.

Do not think it was imagination. There could be no imagination about a sound so distinct. The low, wailing groan, like that of a man in his death agony, rose slowly on the stillness again, followed as before by the harsh, devilish, cackling laugh and the words, "Joe!" "Joe!" repeated, as I imagined in my horror, by my own father's voice.

This time the light did not appear, but a new terror had been added to the scene. I fancied I heard a creaking sound, and straining my ear till my brain seemed to crack made out, as I imagined, quite distinctly the sound of footsteps creeping toward me across the bare planking of the floor.

I am honest enough to confess that in striking another match my hands shook like those of a man with the palsy. Again everything was quiet. Nothing visible except the horses, with heads thrown back, cowering against each other.

I was relieved by the reflection that no material danger at least threatened me, but a new trouble now overtook me. I spilled my matches on the wet hay.

I sat down now in despair, and as I leaned my face upon my hand I could feel the arteries in my temples throbbing like trip hammers. I felt that I could never live through the remainder of that awful night and preserve my reason.

As I pressed my hands upon my throbbing temples and vainly strove to mitigate with reason the blind violence of my terror, I suddenly uttered a wild cry of horror as a long, wet, clammy arm, or what I took for one in the darkness, was thrown tightly around my neck with a cold clasp that nearly strangled me.

As I struggled desperately, with a sickening sense of horror, to release myself from the slimy coils of what I thought must be some gigantic reptile, that same low, mocking, devilish laugh came cackling through the darkness again.

The plunging of the horses, the fiendish laughter, groans and calling of "Joe! Joe!" grew louder and more demoniac, till, maddened with horror, by a superhuman effort I flung the infernal thing, whatever it was, from me, heard it strike with the proverbial dull thud against the side of the barn, and forgetting horses, storm, darkness, distance and everything else, I rushed from the infernal place, and with hair erect and the clamor still ringing in my ears, fled, nor paused to breathe till I had covered the entire distance between there and home, where I arrived, haggard and bespattered, as the first streaks of the gray dawn, the white winged angels of a glad deliverance, came to meet me from the east.

Quickly I told my story, with every detail of touch and coloring possible, you may be sure, and having succeeded by the earnestness of my manner in suitably impressing the minds of the entire family, a circumstance, in view of the character the place already bore, not at all difficult, I hitched up another horse, and in company with my father and younger brother, returned to the scene of my late horrible experiences, and the investigations we there made in reference to the noises and other phenomena will I am afraid, only disgust those imaginative minds which are always on the alert for startling denouements.

The gnawing sounds we found had been produced by the chafing of the wagon hub against a loose board in the haymow, and every time the animals reached forward after their fodder the movement carried a rusty, guttural, scraping of the turntable, which simulated the sound, "Joe, Joe," with sufficient nearness to mislead a cooler head than mine was just at that time.

The demoniac laughter which had so horrified me was of equally absurd origin, being simply the rattling and clattering of a thin, loose clapboard high up in the gable whenever a gust stronger than usual struck it. For the light I could find no explanation other than the only possible fact that it was simply a phosphorescent exhalation from a little swamp near by, one of those luminous methylic vapors, variously known as will-o'-the-wisp, Jack-o'-lantern, ignis fatuus, etc.

The place was infested with rats, and it was doubtless their scurrying back and forth over the floor which sounded so much like stealthy footsteps—either that or the falling of the large raindrops which found their way through the leaky roof.

There too lay the reptile which had so nearly strangled me—a long, soft strip of the inner bark of one of the cedar rafters, which, saturated by the rain, had fallen across the back of my neck as I stooped forward, and you can readily appreciate the sensation such a thing, unexpected and in total darkness, would be apt to produce.

While we were making these discoveries and remarking how a little daylight and good common sense will knock the props from under the best ghost story ever gotten up, we were all startled by a sudden rat-tat-tat on the barn door.

My father hastily unfastened it, expecting of course, to meet one of the neighbors, or possibly a strolling tramp, and I noticed a queer expression come over his face. There was not a soul there.

He had hardly closed the door, however, when the sharp rat-tat-tat was repeated, this time considerably prolonged.

Again the door was opened quickly, and again not a soul was in sight.

There was a little door in the rear of the barn, and, leaving my father and brother looking at one another in a somewhat funny manner, I quietly unfastened this, and as the knocking had recommenced, slipped quickly around outside to the front of the barn, only to see a large redheaded woodpecker diligently tapping away on the door in search of his breakfast.

We got away from that place with all the expedition possible, and ever since my skepticism in reference to the vivid and ornate stories of a similar character, which we so frequently hear, is pretty radically confirmed by the simple remembrance of my own blood curdling experience that night—with the ghosts.

Tar Used on Masonry.

Coal tar has come into extensive use as a means of rendering masonry impervious to water, especially in positions exposed to direct contact with water. Tar used to coat masonry built up of extremely porous stone renders it quite impervious even at a depth of fifty feet of water. Tar ought to be utilized in all public buildings, particularly those designed for the preservation of works of art; for the dissolving action of water upon mortar even of excellent quality is well known, and also the disagreeable consequences of the exudation of water charged with lime salts from the mortar.

The tar may be employed in two different ways; it may be used in a boiling state in one or several layers, or it may be made to flame up before it is used. The first method is suitable for surfaces exposed to the air; the second is appropriate to surfaces which have to be covered up. When boiling coal tar is used in three coats on masonry, the result is a black and very brilliant varnish, which perfectly resists the action of frost, water and sun, and which is absolutely impervious. Its good effects last many years, and in many cases the use of a layer of plaster or cement is rendered unnecessary.

By adding to the coal tar an india rubber paste, produced by dissolving rubber clippings in benzine or petroleum, a coating may be obtained which is still more resistant, elastic and durable. The tendency of the black coating to absorb heat may be overcome by white dusting the whole before the tar is quite dry; the white adheres and the heat is reflected.—New York Telegram.

The Human Nose.

The human nose is an apologetic pimple compared with the magnificent organ of the horse or dog. Our sense of smell is, when contrasted with our sight and hearing, singularly undiscriminating. We can arrange sounds into series; we know E is between D and F; we appreciate octaves and harmonies. Similarly we can put the colors into order, decide upon the amount of blue in a purple and get almost to emotion at the sight of a white star in the blue of a summer twilight or of the amber sunlight gliding between the blades of glass.

But this serial arrangement, this sorting and selective choice, is entirely beyond our rudimentary senses of smell. To us the idea of the scent of the violet being a rich harmony, or the suggestion that the frying of onions is a discord, or that patchouli and the new mown hay are pleasant things in different times and keys, sounds utter nonsense. Our noses are entirely too dull to effect the analysis necessary before scents can be distinguished as complex and sorted and recombined so as to be made an æsthetic pleasure.—London Globe.

He Wanted to Get In.

Jimmy Murphy was a newspaper office boy, and Jimmy was a terror. He did nothing in particular save smoke cigarettes and beg for theater tickets, and was known to all the reporters as "Murph." One night he wanted to go to a certain show very badly, but had not been successful in begging or stealing a ticket from the dramatic editor. He went up to the theater about 8 o'clock and stood around the gallery entrance in the hope that he could in some way gain admittance. The manager of the theater came along in a little while, and noticing him standing there, said, "Hello, Murph!" and went into the house.

Five minutes later "Murph" walked up to the doorkeeper at the main entrance and said, "Say, is de manager in?"

"What do you want to know for?" asked the guardian of the portal.

"Well, I wanter see him, see?"

"But what do you want to see him for?"

"I wanter get him ter pass me in."

"But he won't do it."

"I tink he will, see?"

"What makes you think that?"

"Well, he came along out dere an said, 'Hello, Murph,' an everybody wots familiar cuff wid me to call me 'Murph,' will do a little favor like dat fer me."—Buffalo Express.

A white headed vulture which was caught in 1706 died in the aviary at Schonbrun, near Vienna, in 1824.

TO ADVERTISERS

A list of 1000 newspapers divided into STATES AND SECTIONS will be sent on application—FREE.

To those who want their advertising to pay, we can offer no better medium for thorough and decisive work than the various sections of our Select Local List. GEO. P. ROWELL & CO., Newspaper Advertising Bureau, 10 Spruce Street, New York.

Have you money? If you have not, wisdom and intelligent application suggest a safe course. I guarantee you my special personal attention. I undertake to benefit each any fairly intelligent person of either sex, who can read and write, and who, after instruction, will work industriously, how to earn Three Thousand Dollars a year in their own localities, wherever they live. I will also furnish the situation or employment, as which you can earn that amount. I charge nothing and receive nothing unless successful, as above. Nothing difficult to learn, or that requires much time. I desire but one person from each district or county. I have already taught and provided with employment a large number who are making over Three Thousand Dollars a Year, each. All in new, solid, sure. Full particulars free. Address, E. C. BORN.

FULTON—Near Bishop, May 23, 1892, to Mr. and Mrs. J. E. Fulton, a daughter.

E. Spencer Esq. of Big Pine was in town yesterday.

Wm. Rowan of Bishop was in town Wednesday.

J. J. Gunn arrived in town from Modock this morning.

There will be a wedding at Lone Pine next week, so says rumor.

A number of residents of Lone Pine visited Independence early in the week.

Regular stated meeting of Inyo Lodge No. 221, F. & A. M., to-morrow evening.

The County Clerk issued a marriage license on Tuesday to William C. Balbitt and Nettie P. Olds.

Mrs. J. J. Gunn came in from Modock at the end of last week and will remain at Independence for the summer.

Arthur Nobles will operate the Sierra Nevada ice-house during the coming season. He made the first trip with his pack train this week.

E. H. Edwards came up from Lone Pine yesterday on business connected with the settlement of the estate of C. D. Begole, deceased.

Old Boreas has got a word to say yet on the summer question. He came sailing down from the north and made things pretty lively for a few hours this morning.

Miss Maggie Gorman arrived from San Francisco on Wednesday's train. She will spend the summer vacation with her parents at Independence and will return when school reopens.

Peter Jackson whipped Frank Slavin at London last Monday. Slavin was "not in it", the darky having the best of the mill from start to finish. Jackson won in the tenth round.

Miss May Parker's term of private school closes to-day. Miss Parker has accomplished a great deal of good with the little ones, and her efforts should meet with due recognition on the part of the parents.

Colonel Frederick A. Bee, the Chinese Consul, died suddenly in San Francisco last Thursday from heart disease at 3:45 o'clock in the store of L. G. Sresovich, 305 Sansome street, at the corner of Clay.

A. W. Eibeshutz went to Keeler to meet his children on Wednesday, returning yesterday morning. He says a small force of men is still employed at the soda works making new vats and otherwise extending the facilities for making soda.

Lloyd Tevis has announced that his resignation as President of Wells, Fargo & Co., and Wells-Fargo Bank would go into effect on August 1st. It is his intention in the future to devote his undivided attention to his large private interests.

Miss Huldah Harris, Miss Ettie Wood, Miss Elsie Eibeshutz and Master Julian Eibeshutz arrived yesterday morning from San Francisco coming by way of Mojave. They will spend their summer vacation at Independence and return to the city when the fall term of school opens.

One of the possibilities of the near future is the purchase of the Carson & Colorado railroad by the Union Pacific Company and the extension of the road to Los Angeles. Work is being rapidly pushed on the Union Pacific extension from Milford to Pioche. The people of Owens Valley hail any possibility of an outlet to the south.

J. W. Clark, Receiver of the local Land Office, publishes his announcement this week as a candidate for County Clerk. Mr. Clark is well and favorably known throughout the county, having lived at Bishop from childhood. He is a man of steady habits and if chosen to fill the office to which he aspires will perform his duties in a conscientious manner.

Lone Pine News.

Mr. McKenzie has rented Mr. Boland's house south of town and taken up his abode there.

The baby of Santos Martinez died Saturday last and was buried Sunday.

Mr. Wilson had a house warming one evening last week. Those who attended tripped the "light fantastic" until daybreak and pronounce Mr. Wilson the prince of hosts.

Last Saturday evening some persons were musically inclined—inclined that way until next morning, much to the wrath of the good mothers who had cross babies to attend.

Mrs. Fitzgerald returned to Modock one day last week.

Mrs. Diaz and her family are intending to move to the ranch very shortly.

Mrs. Rolles Carrasco returned to Keeler Monday.

Why do we hear so little of Memorial day in Inyo? Are there so few of those who wore the blue laid to rest here?

H. E. R.

Sheep Licenses.

Sheep License collector A. O. Collins turned into the county $5,186 after deducting his commissions. There are few people who realize the benefit the sheep trade is to Owens Valley. There is not less than $80,000 left in the Valley every year by the sheep men. In the fall of the year every farmer who has feed to sell can find a purchaser at good prices, and many a farmer regards the money he gets from the sheep men as a Godsend about tax time. The money paid in for licenses is but a small proportion of the benefit received, but that will operate materially to diminish the load of taxation.

The Omaha Beef Market.

The Reno Gazette of May 30th says: "Hon. Lem. Allen of Churchill county was here yesterday. Mr. Allen has just returned from a business trip to Omaha, where he went to investigate the eastern beef market. He says the market will advance within the next few days a half-cent a pound on the gross weight of steers, and that the outlook for a fine fall market was never better than now.

It was reported in San Francisco last week that the London owners of the Holmes mine at Candelaria would resume operations at the works on June 1st. It was said that the differences between the men had been amicably settled and that steady work would be the result. We have not yet learned whether the report was well founded, but earnestly hope it may be true, as Candelaria affords a profitable market for Inyo county products when the mines are running.

On Friday evening last a Lodge of Good Templars was regularly organized at Independence with a membership of twenty. Seventeen members of the Bishop Lodge were present and fifteen from Big Pine. The new organization was launched upon its career under the most favorable circumstances. A complete list of officers were elected and installed and regular stated meetings will be held at the Masonic Hall every Friday evening.

There will be upwards of $20,000 left in the Treasury vault at the close of the present fiscal year. Considering that less than 35,000 dollars is required annually to run the county the tax rate this year should not be more than $1.50 per $100. With such a tax rate real estate in Inyo county will be a most profitable investment, and outside capitalists will not be slow in discovering the fact.

Mr. J. P. Blaize, an extensive real estate dealer in Des Moines, Iowa, narrowly escaped one of the severest attacks of pneumonia while in the northern part of that State during a recent blizzard, says the Saturday Review. Mr. Blaise had occasion to drive several miles during the storm and was so thoroughly chilled that he was unable to get warm, and inside of an hour after his return he was threatened with a severe case of pneumonia or lung fever. Mr. Blaize sent to the nearest drug store and got a bottle of Chamberlain's Cough Remedy, of which he had often heard, and took a number of large doses. He says the effect was wonderful and that in a short time he was breathing quite easily. He kept on taking the medicine and in a few days was able to come to Des Moines. Mr. Blaize regards his cure as simply wonderful. 50 cent bottles for sale by

27% Difference

The "Royal" the Strongest and Purest Baking Powder.

Whether any other baking powder is equal to "Royal," let the official reports decide. When the different powders were purchased on the open market and examined by Prof. Chandler, of the New-York Board of Health, the result showed that Royal Baking Powder contained twenty-seven per cent. greater strength than any other brand.

If one pound of Royal Baking Powder sells for 50 cents,

One pound of no other powder is worth over 36 cents.

If another baking powder is forced upon you by the grocer in place of the Royal, see that you are charged the correspondingly lower price.

A TRAGEDY OF GENIUS.

The name of this emigre was Pierre Leger. His alleged mission was to give more profitable exercise to his mechanical skill in the broad field of American industry. He had come to our shores to escape that curse of pauper labor competition existing in his own ancient and somewhat overcrowded continent.

Possessing characteristic French frugality and an avowed degree of proficiency in his profession, this sanguine young foreign mechanic felt already assured that a few years of well directed toil in his line in the New World would enable him to win comparative wealth here, when he would return to France, transporting his fortune as a marital tribute to his fair and plump fiancee living far away in Paris.

The misfortune of not having previously learned the United States language proved to be a tremendous obstacle against this young man's immediate prosperity. After wandering wearily for many days through the strange streets of the American metropolis, he could find no doorway open for him to that magical domain of modern American industry.

Pierre Leger at last lost heart. He had not another franc left to pay for a night's lodging, not another sou whereWith to purchase a morsel of bread. Thus, shrugging his shoulders with expressive sang froid, he decided to terminate his existence.

An hour after midnight, exactly one month after his arrival in America, this despondent young Frenchman, with haggard eyes, hollow cheeks and shivering frame, stood on the very edge of an East river quay, gazing down into the dark depths of the water. The tide below lay like a lake of cold blue steel polished dimly by the waning light of a wintry moon. Above was an equally pitiless expanse of chill blue sky, in which the cheerless stars appeared to be but pale points of frozen light and the moon but a round fragment of some celestial iceberg. A self doomed wretch, this poor man leaned forward—further—further, as if some irresistible power were behind pushing him slowly to his untimely fate. No friend in the night was near to reach forth a rescuing hand and drag him away from that certain embrace of death.

As that dread self sacrifice was about to be completed, Leger drew back with a startled and less dreary expression on his pallid features. A single wavelet had cut athwart the reflected face of the round moon looking up at him from the steel blue water. Its rippling light, smiling back, as it were, to his own mournful gaze, reminded him of the bright face in his distant native city which had inspired him to go forth and seek his fortune across the wide sea.

It was Cochonette who looked at him thus from the lustrous reflected sphere, divided into the semblance of a silent laugh by that dimpling ripple across its middle; Cochonette, the companion of of his holiday rambles in the Bois and Champs Elysees, when humbler Paris takes the air; Cochonette, the happy consoler of long gone hours of loneliness; Cochonette, whose little round hands and pouting lips had pressed him with alternate farewells as he went forth, a voluntary exile, for a few or many years into a remote and strange land!

It was thus fortunate for Pierre that the moon was both full and in the zenith. But for this he would not have seen the reflection, nor been reminded of her from whom he had parted. As it was, he saw what he did, and decided to postpone his tragedy, to make yet another trial.

Providence seemed to reward him for his better resolve; for, on looking upward, a new idea was at once implanted in the brain of the reinvigorated man. Before him lay moored a rag transporting vessel from Marseilles. It was the latest arrival. The day before he had read from The Courier des Etats Unis, in a small French wine shop of the city, that the cholera had appeared in certain Mediterranean ports, and the New York health board would permit the importation of no more cargoes of rags henceforward from that quarter of the world.

Pierre resolved at once to turn chiffonier; and even before the morning sun had risen the industrious young man had gathered about as large a bundle of rags as he could conveniently carry in his emaciated condition. For these he was paid, to his astonishment, 20 cents, or about 1 franc. After a few days of work, with a bag upon his shoulders, the energetic citizen of France was enabled to purchase and propel his own push cart, with its round bags well stuffed with rags and its merrily jingling bells.

At the end of a year Leger resided in a modest habitation of the "Five Points," which he had procured for himself. He no longer picked his own rags. There were whole battalions of barefooted and bareheaded gamins in the locality where he lived. He enlisted a great brigade of these to pursue his profession in community of interest. He called them with pride his "Gardes Sans Culottes," and sheltered their captains in barracks, up in the little garret under his roof.

Another year of constantly increasing business passed after the first, and the faithful lover was enabled to send for Cochonette, his plump little grisette, who had patiently waited for him to bring her his fortune behind a counter in a little second hand glove store near the Mont de Piete, kept by one Jacques Legros, who procured his stock from the unredeemed pledges of the famous pawn shop.

* * * * * *

It is a matter of astonishment how, after having once been stimulated, the fertile resources of M. Pierre Leger were brought into play. Combining with one Hans Van Damschloss, an emigre from Amsterdam, he erected and successfully conducted a great paper mill from the raw products of his rag business, which, as the years went by, grew enormous in quantity. Still later a magnificent idea struck him. He "saw" several distinguished American officials of the municipal government of New York, and from them obtained the contract of picking over for rags the garbage of that great city. The other pickings in this monopoly were farmed out to a number of Italians, played out in the hand organ business. This fat contract warranted the very great extension of the Leger & Van Damschloss paper mills.

In time the Legers moved to Fifth avenue, on which noted thoroughfare their elegant mansion was one of the most conspicuous ornaments. As for Van Damschloss he had already the early promise of having another "Van" emblazoned on the Knickerbocker book of peerage of the American metropolis.

Upon these two men and their families fortune smiled brightly, distributing her favors with lavish hands. The genius of American liberty has lifted them both far above the toiling masses of the Old World, whence they came. But proud America should yield them yet more of her treasures. It was the land of invention, and from the unfathomed mystery of further invention they should wring further millions of riches!

While they were building their mighty fortunes steam power had been almost perfected, electricity had been further trained from simple telegraphic transmission to perform illuminating, telephonic and phonographic work. It had been taught to vibrate on the tongues of the living and linger on the lips of the dead. The genius of the lightning had been curbed to perform menial hotel and household services, and to rend the rugged breast of the mountain with exploded mine.

But there is one other mysterious and sublime force in the system of electro-thermo dynamics which man has not yet controlled. Science has demonstrated the fact that nature employs in the evaporation and condensation of one gallon of water a subtle and sublime power, capable of removing a range of mountains. If that force could be converted into the controllable essence of motion by man he could move the world, split continents for his mighty canals like those of the planet Mars, blow loaded railroad trains along like tiny feathers or snowflakes before the fierce tornado's blast and circumnavigate the globe in eighty minutes.

These are some of the mere possibilities of controlling but one more thermo-electro force. Mr. Keely has but so far toyed with its fearful mysteries in obtaining a motor pressure of 15,000 pounds to the square inch of motive surface. His volatile and vibratory ether of water is but as the breath of a body whose muscle is capable of producing the enormous pressure of at least 15,000,000 pounds to the square inch.

Messrs. Leger and Van Damschloss determined, after long consultation, to try their hands at the evolution of this unknown force. M. Leger was really a mechanical genius, who had hitherto had the good luck to let his genius alone and amass wealth by attending to other things, contrary to the course of the usual run of geniuses, who perish in poverty and let posterity profit by their inventions.

M. Leger maintained that Mr. Keely's principle was to liberate the hydrogen from water under tremendous pressure, and to use this highly compressed hydrogen as his motive power. Such accidental liberation of hydrogen from water under extreme pressure is alleged by scientific men to cause some of the mysterious, terrible and tragic boiler explosions of the times.

M. Leger's plan, considered by himself as a marked improvement on Mr. Keely's, was to completely remove the hydrogen under pressure, to store it by itself in the strongest steel reservoir which mechanical art could construct, and there, by electrical disintegration, to separate the component parts of the hydrogen, and to utilize its most elastic compound gas as the source of power.

This modern inventor considered the theory most satisfactorily disproved that hydrogen was a simple and indivisible element of nature, eminent scientists agreeing with him. He considered this most subtle and active gas known as a divisible compound. If it could be separated its most active and powerful principle might be seized and made available. Here was the key to his situation, theoretically at least.

Impressing these views upon the mind of his partner, these two gentlemen had a most massive steel cylinder manufactured and moved to the top of their establishment, under the pretext that they wished to experiment with a new and extraordinary powerful pulp roller. Having had this roller duly elevated to the desired place, in secret, they constructed several electric batteries for the disorganization of water and the storage of hydrogen under pressure. Finally they charged the main steel cylinder with hydrogen under enormous compression, and determined to make further arrangements in the proper time for connecting this cylinder clandestinely with the wires of an electric storage plant, to further separate by electrical action the modernly claimed component gases of the hydrogen. For safety against accident they had screwed into their immense steel reservoir a Keeley 15,000 pound registering gauge and like pressure safety valve.

One midnight, in course of time, everything was ready. The steel reservoir was charged with hydrogen already stored under 1,500 pounds pressure per square inch. Two or three hours were consumed by the two concealed toilers in perfecting the connection with the wires between their hydrogen storage reservoir and the public electric plant which furnished light and power to their paper mills.

Shortly after 3 a. m. all was finished. The partners stood facing each other at their respective posts, one at the east the other at the west end of their mysterious machine. Leger's eyes burned with a brilliant, expectant light. Van Damschloss stood pale and excited out of his usual stolidity. He held in his large right hand the button which was to close the electric current to the machine.

Hoarsely whispered Leger, "Are you ready, Van?"

"Yah," responded Van Damschloss.

"Then let her go, Van!"

She went.

* * * * * *

"At 3:15 o'clock this morning an immense incandescent meteor descended upon the city, bursting with a terrific report, like 10,000 thunderclaps in one. Windows were broken in square miles of buildings, the stone pavements of the street even were cracked for some distance from the point where the fiery celestial visitant fell. It seems to have struck the top of the Leger & Van Damschloss paper mills, completely demolishing the three upper stories of that extensive establishment. It filled the floors beneath and the pavements around with finely pulverized meteoric dust, composed of decarbonized aeroltic iron (as found by analysis this morning in the laboratory of Columbia college). Very fortunately only the basement of the great building was occupied at the time, and as there were neither pedestrians nor policemen on the street at that early hour no loss of life is recorded. Since the deplorable catastrophe occurred the distinguished heads of the firm have been missing. As they left their homes before midnight last night, starting on a fishing trip to the Adirondacks, no anxiety on their account is felt by their respective families. The building, with stock, is covered by $250,000 insurance, mostly in foreign companies. It is learned that the agents of these will refuse to pay for the extensive damages sustained, as they claim they do not insure against meteoric fire or destruction, consequently there is a prospect of some novel and interesting litigation in our courts."

The morning after the disaster The San Francisco Call printed the following:

"About midnight last night a strange object was found by the police in Chinatown. It was an extensive working blouse of costly make and apparently of Dutch manufacture, as is seen by reference to convenient lists of national costumes. This blouse had a long and bloody rent in its back, through which its evidently murdered occupant was drawn forth by some ignorant heathen who did not know now to unbutton the garment. Here is certainly another case of Chinese atrocity. The whole police force is now busily searching for the body of the victim, and every joss house in Chinatown is being gutted for a clew to the murder. The shout of maddened mobs in the vicinity of the disturbance is unanimously that the 'Chinese must go!'"

The Paris Monitor, printed the morning after the explosion, had the following strange news, thus translated from its columns:

"Just after dawn yesterday morning a curious object was seen fluttering from the pinnacle of one of the spires of Notre Dame. It was an indescribable thing, seeming to be two empty sleeves waving in the wind, as disclosed by a powerful field glass. A stronger gust than usual blew the object to the ground, when it proved to be a small pair of Parisian trousers, stained with grease and dust composed of the fresh fillings of decarbonized steel. Today the prefecture of police will take means to discover the perpetrator of this desecration most hideous and grotesque, who will without doubt soon have an opportunity of explaining his diabolical facetiousness before a juge de paix."

Notwithstanding a thorough subsequent search of the Adirondack mountains, Messrs. Leger and Van Damschloss, since the visit of the great aforesaid meteor to New York, have been as much missing as if they had left this world entirely and taken passage to remote parts of the universe on the tail of the last big comet that visited our planet.

The possible evolution of their infinite thermo-electro-dynamic principle remains still purely conjectural.—Andrews Wilkinson in New Orleans Times Democrat.

Always Sits Down When He Shaves.

I know an old farmer who shaved himself sitting on a milking stool and looking at his reflection in a bucket of water. That was what he did as a boy, and he said that he couldn't shave standing up.—Boston Cor. St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Tobacco Worth Its Weight in Silver.

In England the first pipes used appear to have been made of clay, with narrow bowls and contracted mouths. Then, as the habit grew stronger and tobacco became cheaper, something more capacious would be required. These are the pipes which, under the name of "fairy pipes," are sometimes dug up and preserved as interesting relics of the past. Aubrey, writing about 1680, says: "The English people first had silver pipes, but the ordinary sort made use of walnut shell and strawe. I have heard my grandfather say that one pipe was handed from man to man 'round the table. Within these thirty-five years 'twas scandalous for a divine to take tobacco. It was then sold for its wayte in silver. I have heard some of our old yeoman neighbours say that when they went to market they culled out their biggest shillings to lay in the scales against tobacco; now the customers of it are the greatest his majesty hath."—All the Year Round.

The Limits of the Modern Drama.

The debate at the London Playgoers' club on Tuesday evening was remarkably interesting. Mr. R. Jope Slade's paper on "Conventionality in Art" was an excellent plea for good, sound, old fashioned notions, as opposed to the fads of the hour. Mr. David Christie Murray, the chairman, delivered an oration which contained not a few well dealt blows at the "naturalistic young gentleman." Well said and to be remembered was the following admirable sentence: "There are," said he, "phases of life and thought with which the dramatist should have nothing to do. Any thing which we could not possibly discuss before a mixed company in private ought not to be dramatized before a mixed company in public."—London Saturday Review.

It Was Something Else.

While a Baker street car was being accidentally rolled along at a speed of four miles an hour the other afternoon the connection with the drawbar broke and the whiffletrees fell down at the horses' heels. The noise was enough to momentarily alarm all the passengers and everybody sprang up. Among them was a motherly looking woman, with a dozen eggs in a basket. After she had ascertained what had happened she sat down and remarked:

"Well, I declare if I didn't jest say to myself when the smash came that the children had broken another lamp chimney or pulled the teapot off the table!"—Detroit Free Press.

Visions of Young Children.

Some children transcend the opium eater in their capacity for seeing visions, projecting clearly defined images before them on the darkness; strange figures, large, saucer eyes, like those of the dog in the fairy tale, floating detached from any setting, or even fiendish faces. It is curious to find De Quincy comparing his experiences on the matter with a little box, exchanging notes on the frequency and the manner of these appearances. "I can tell them to go, and they go," said the child; "but sometimes they come when I don't tell them to come."—Argosy.

The following is an extract of a letter from Dr. James Burrough to Mr. Houghton, F. R. S., dated in 1700: "About a month ago, at Stanton, a laboring man of middle age had for some time so inordinate an appetite that I had it attested by an eye witness that he ate up an ordinary leg of veal, roasted, at a meal, and fed at this rate for many days together. He would eat sow thistles and other herbs as greedily as beasts which use such food."

Stick to it!

Sometimes you may have to wait. The troubles that have been years in gathering can't always be cleared away in a day. For all the diseases and disorders peculiar to womanhood, Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is the surest and speediest remedy. You can depend upon that—but if your case is obstinate, give it reasonable time.

It's an invigorating, restorative tonic, a soothing and strengthening nervine, and a positive specific for female weaknesses and ailments. All functional disturbances, painful irregularities and derangements are corrected and cured by it. All unnatural discharges, bearing-down sensations, weak back, accompanied with faint spells and kindred symptoms, are corrected. In every case for which it's recommended, "Favorite Prescription," is guaranteed to give satisfaction, or the money is refunded. No other medicine for women is sold on such terms. That proves that nothing else offered by the dealer can be "just as good."

THE HERCULES.

In placing the Hercules Gas or Gasoline in the field in competition with other so-called gas engines, we do so with the utmost confidence that we are "in it." Our system of operating this engine is so far ahead of all others that it needs but an introduction in any community to insure an immense sale. A woman can handle it. It requires no engineer. It can be started in an instant. No electric spark to get out of order. It oils itself. It beats all others. Write Palmer & Rey, 405-407 Sansome St., San Francisco for particulars. SAFETY IN THE MIDST OF DANGER.

This would seem a contradiction—is so, in fact, to the eye. But experience has proved its possibility. Take the case of the individual who dwells in a malarious region. A robust constitution is no certain defence against the dreaded chills. What is? Recorded testimony, covering a period little short of half a century, proves that Hostetter's Stomach Bitters is precisely this. This continent does not limit the field where the medicine has proved its efficacy. In South America, the isthmus of Panama, Mexico, everywhere in fact where miasma-born disease takes on its most obstinate and formidable types, the Bitters is a recognized specific in illimitable demand, and prescribed by physicians of repute. Potent, too, is it in disorders of the stomach, liver and bowels, and against that destroyer, la grippe. It improves appetite and sleep, neutralizes rheumatism and kidney complaints.

The man who is shadowed is necessarily under a cloud.

BACK FROM THE TOMB.

Are These Ghost Stories Worthy of Belief.

THE STRANGE CASE OF JOHN ANDERSON

Haunted by a Murdered Woman and a Lost Son.—Back to Earth.

As long as the world lasts people will claim to have seen ghosts and other people will assert that the claimants have been the victims of self delusion or of deceptions originating with interested parties.

So the controversy will go on, never settled according to established rules of evidence, but at the same time possessing a fascination both for the scoffer at and the believer in supernatural appearances.

Two cases now challenging the public verdict are of more than ordinary importance. The first is that of Millionaire John Anderson, a New York tobacconist, who died in Paris a decade ago, and whose strange experiences are being recounted in court during the progress of a suit brought by his daughter, Mrs. Laura Appleton, to secure a one-fifth interest in the Plaza hotel site, which belonged to her father. The litigation in itself would not attract general attention were it not for the strong side lights of supernaturalism thrown on the stage of the inquiry.

More years ago than most folks now living care to remember, Anderson had as a clerk in his cigar store a girl named Mary Rogers, who was celebrated for her beauty and fondness for unrestricted pleasure. One day strangers found her mangled corpse in Weehawken. The subsequent hunt for the murderer agitated the whole country, and the reader who is desirous for the details is referred to Edgar Allan Poe's story, "Marie Roget," in which, under a thin disguise of fiction, the facts are presented with startling vividness. Anderson, as well as others, was accused of being the assassin, but no absolute proof could be brought against him. He was married, the father of a family and not happy in his domestic relations. A favorite son named William died young, as he claimed, because of the mother's neglect. A separation followed, and the old gentleman "took up" with an actress, who, despite the illegality of their connection, is said to have made his last days comfortable.

The tragedy of Mary Rogers' taking off and the death of "little Willie" materially changed John Anderson's mental view. He began to dream dreams and to have visions. Waking or sleeping the pretty cigar girl and the lost son were his constant companions, and the fact that he claimed to see them and that he frequently called his friends' attention to their presence is one of the collateral factors in the present complicated litigation.

The case of Tom Guthrie may more largely interest those engaged in psychical research, because the appearance of the apparition is vouched for by several reputable witnesses. In 1872 Guthrie, a negro, just about of age, slew Joseph McNeal, an octogenarian, white, who protected his feeble old wife from criminal assault. The assassin was captured, tried and hanged after making confession. On the gallows Guthrie closed his farewell speech with the remark, "I will come again." Several weeks after the execution boys at play near the building where the body had been dissected heard a voice assert, "I am Tom Guthrie."

No further disturbance occurred until recently. Now it is claimed that the negro's shrouded skeleton haunts the scene of the hanging and of the murder. Written statements have been made to this effect by at least three persons. Dr. Addison Harlan met the spook and fired at it without effect. Professor Thomas Halley, a well known music teacher, encountered it while returning from singing school, and Harrison Gentrey, a planter of excellent reputation, while driving to a train "saw in the road before me Tom Guthrie as plain as I ever saw him in life. He pressed his hand to his neck and shook his head, and while I looked at him began to disappear, and in less than half a minute there was nothing where he had been standing."

A pleasant faced young woman and her husband took their seats at the hotel table opposite a dapper little dude fresh from the center of the highest civilization. During the meal the husband requested the little man to hand him something, and all he received was a cold, rude stare. He was mad in a minute, and was about to make a few remarks when his wife laid her hand gently on his arm.

"Don't, Henry," she said reprovingly. "Don't pay any attention to it. You know you shouldn't expect to find everything in such a small package."

How a Great Mine Was Discovered.

A walk over the mountain to Friedensville, Pa., one spring day when the farmers were plowing their fields, brought the late Dr. Roepper, well known to mineralogists, to where a team was dragging a plow near the road. A talk with the driver brought out the fact that his farm was cursed with more than the usual amount of stones, and a sample was tossed over the fence to the doctor as evidence. It was recognized as a mass of quartz carrying calamine—a silicate of zinc. The fence was climbed and the two followed the plow forward and back across a field covered with similar masses.

Had the doctor been a sharper he would have bought the farm and died a rich man. As he was only an honest lover of nature he said a few words to the plowman that transformed an exhausted Pennsylvania farm into the seat of the Ueberroth mine; that set in operation the extensive zinc works of Bethlehem, Pa., and built the "President"—a pump that could raise 17,000 gallons of water per minute. This chance shot at a fortune is but one of many, and a dozen volumes would ill suffice to note the salient points of the record. If so much can be done haphazard it is evident that a systematic training in economic geology will furnish a means for a livelihood, as well as an aid in the consideration of economic questions in mining.—Engineering Magazine.

Weighed in the Balance.

Goslin—Congwatulate me, deah fellaw.

Hunker—What's the occasion, my boy?

Goslin—I'm engaged, doncher know.

Hunker—Then I congratulate you most sincerely. May I ask the lady's name!

Hunker—Is that all?

Goslin—Whatevah do you mean?

Hunker—How heavy is she?

Goslin—Oh, I know that exactly. We were both weighed the other day, doncher know, and Mabel—er, I mean Miss Swayback—weighed pwecisely ninety-five pounds.

Hunker—Then let us see. Gold is worth $19.35 an ounce, but for this purpose we will assume that is worth twenty dollars.

Goslin (interrupting)—Whatevah do you mean?

Hunker—I'm just making a simple calculation. In ninety-five pounds avoirdupois there are 1,520 ounces. These at twenty dollars per ounce would make Miss Swayback worth a few hundred over $30,000.

Goslin—My deah sir, you are pawsitively insulting, and I shall call——

Hunker—Not at all. You said she was worth her weight in gold, and I wanted to compare her worth with that of my fiancee. Now Miss Scadds is worth $500,000 in stocks, and—why, Goslin's gone. I hope he isn't cross.—Philadelphia Press.

Character in Writing Inks.

Did you ever notice what an unfailing criterion as to character the use of the different inks are? The mamby pamby, dead and alive, affected and no account sort of person is apt to use the palest kind of writing fluid. The same with the insincere and crafty person and the scheming and selfish seeker after personal ends and advantages. The honest man and the reliable woman use good, well colored ink; the genius and the person blessed with individuality use the blackest ink that flows. Intellectual people are fond of all dark inks and affect violet a good deal. In all my experience I never knew a person with any decided ability or "vim" to use copying fluid. They like to make a good, sturdy impress of their individuality on everything, the paper they write a message on as well as the times in which they live.

Give me your positive folks every time, not afraid to make a distinct impress of themselves in whatever they undertake. Secretive people, over reticent people and absurd players at the delicate game of policy like to hide themselves behind the bewilderments of fine pens and the palest sort of ink. Take the trouble to watch, and you will see that what I say is true in the main.—Chicago Herald.

Misunderstood.

He was a well known divine, and he had come to the Tombs in search of material for a sermon upon the hardened and unrepentant criminal. A number of very fine specimens in this line had just returned from receiving their sentences at special sessions, and the minister talked briefly with each of them. The last of the lot was a bright particular star. His specialty was sneak thieving, and after having attained distinction in London as a genius among his class, he determined to come over and experiment on a few American domiciles. His first effort was successful, but three days afterward the wily detectives gathered him in.

The expression which he wore was one of such intense grief that the minister was touched.

"My friend," he remarked, "you must have been through a sad experience?"

The burglar heaved a sigh.

To Remove Glass Stoppers.

Sometimes it is very difficult to remove a glass stopper from a bottle. A cloth wet in hot water sometimes is sufficient; but if this fails, remember that the principle is to expand the neck of the bottle by heat and not the stopper. With hot water, the latter is often heated equally with the neck, and thus the desired effect is not produced. By holding the neck of the bottle about half an inch above the flame of a lamp or candle, however, in a few seconds the most obstinate cork will generally come out. Care must be taken to turn the bottle rapidly, and not allow the flame to touch the glass, as it might crack it. When the glass is thoroughly heated a steady pull and twist will almost always bring out the stopper.—New York Tribune.

A Simple Marriage Ceremony.

In Hindostan the marriage ceremony is short and simple, and no courting precedes it. The arrangements are made by the friends or relatives of the principals. When the bride and groom are brought together, in many cases they see each other for the first time. The bride playfully skips toward him and seats herself beside him. The priest ties a corner of the bride's vail to the groom's shawl and they are man and wife.—Yankee Blade.

A Japanese Fish.

A favorite food fish in Japan is the tai. It contains two bones the Japanese call, from their shape, the hoe and sickel. When eating the fish a mother will tell her children, "Now wait till I get you the hoe and sickel," and the children use them as playthings.—Philadelphia Ledger.

In the Pacific Northwest there are 20,000,000 acres, with the trees standing so close that it is often difficult to walk between them. Some will yield 100,000 feet to the acre, though the average is not above 25,000 feet.

MYSTERIES OF THE BODY.

Minute Workers that Produce Vital Activity.

MAN IS A WORLD WITHIN HIMSELF.

Some days ago a person remarked in my hearing that, while science dealt with both the big things and the little things of life and nature, it had in reality thrown very little light indeed on the more intricate bodily processes in virtue of which life is carried on. The plaint of my friend was that science knew about things "in the rough," but could not descend to take cognizance in the same degree of things of minute estate. "So much the worse for science and mankind at large," I replied, "were your assertion true." As a matter of fact, there is no field of inquiry which has yielded such a large harvest to the truth seeker of late years as that of microscopic research. There is scarcely a great discovery which has been made within the past decade in which our knowledge of the infinitely little, as shown forth by the microscope, has not figured most prominently.

Disease germs and countless other lower forms of life have been traced out in their development and tracked to their origin. Living things whose dimensions are to be estimated by the thousandth parts of inches are as well known to us today as is the ostrich or the elephant. So far from the "little things" of the universe escaping our attention, I should be inclined to maintain that they largely monopolize science to the exclusion of big things. We are beginning to find out, in fact, that only by knowing something of the actions which proceed in the lower byway of life can existence in the main be understood at all. Hence, if any preparation for a knowledge of humanity be required, I should say one would find it in a microscopic study of what the ditches contain and of what a leaf harbors. "The proper study of mankind is man," said the poet of Twickenham. To this very proper aphorism (in its way) science adds that the only safe preparation for the study of mankind is the knowledge of what lower life is and what lower life does.

The remark of my friend suggested that within the compass even of human structures (and that strictly following out Pope's aphorism) one may find many phases of life such as will warrant the declaration that to the microscope we owe a vast amount of knowledge of ourselves. It has often been asserted that man is a microcosm—a world within himself; and this is highly true if we apply the saying to the microscopic structures of his frame. No sooner do we begin to investigate the composition of man's tissues than we discover that, so far from a human being having any right to be regarded as a single entity, he might claim a title to be considered a compound or colonial organism. One man in his time is said to play many parts, according to the Bard of Avon; physiologically, it may be said, one man is very many parts or entities working together to form and to maintain an harmonious whole. This statement is easily proved. We do not speak without knowing when we make such an assertion.

Glance through the body's constitution, and you will find, first of all, that, wherever you have life and vital activity, it resides in a particular kind of living jelly which everybody knows (by name, at least) as "protoplasm." This is the "matter of life"—it is life stuff, in the truest sense, since no other matter on the face of this earth, save protoplasm, shows the phenomena or actions of life. Now, what is true of a man's body in this respect is equally true of the body of every other living thing—animal or plant. When we come to investigate how this protoplasm (or a speck of which the whole body in its germ state once consisted) is disposed in our frames, we discover that it is represented in its most active state by microscopic bodies to which the name of "cells" is given.

These cells, then, are the workers of the body. They are the population of the vital kingdom. The democrats are the cells—useful and necessary and respectable members of society—which toil and labor to build up bones, to form muscles and to make the various secretions. The aristocrats are the nerve cells, which are by no means an idle plutocracy, however, but which work hard enough in the ruling, direction and governance of the frame. There is perfect division of labor in the living state. One group of cells does not interfere with the work of another group. Each piece of labor, from the building of bone to the making of gastric juice, is carried out independently and thoroughly by workers set apart for the given purpose. The economy of a bee's hive is not more rigidly ordered than is the work of our own body in respect to its labors and their specific duties; and in the vast proportion of their affairs these workers of ours are self directive, even while they own the supremacy of brain and nerves as their controlling power.

If we think of the countless operations which have to be undertaken from hour to hour to maintain our bodies in action, we may begin to realize what perfect co-operation really means, and what this colonial constitution of ours implies. For example, saliva has to be secreted, for the purpose of digestion, in the mouth, and for other functions as well. This fluid is supplied by three pairs of salivary glands. Now, the working and essential parts of these glands are living cells, which, out of the blood (as the raw material) supplied to the glands, secrete saliva, which is the manufactured product. Again, tears have perpetually to be made for washing the eyes. This secretion is supplied by a couple of tear glands, and making out of the blood a very different secretion to that of the mouth. The cells of the gastric glands of the stomach make, from the blood, gastric juice. Again, we see a change of duty as we pass to a different set of cells.

The cells of the liver compose that large organ, and discharge its multifarious duties. They are the living units of which the liver is composed, and are thus part and parcel of the living colony we term our body. The cells of the sweetbread make the digestive juice of that gland—another change of duty and another race of cells. The brain cells guide and direct the body's highest acts equally with lower nervous operations. Cells in the skin repair our wounds and throw off other cells which are cast away as the outer skin wears. The bone cells renew and repair that dense structure and build up the solid portions of the frame. In a word, every act of life is performed by the cells, each group of which remains distinct as a colony of workers charged with the performance of a specific duty. Truly, then, it may be held that our life is a divided existence physically, while from another point of view it is an harmonious existence, because of the perfect co-operation of these wonderful workers of the body—the living cells.—Andrew Wilson in London Illustrated News.

NERVOUS EXTRAVAGANCE.

Many People Waste Energy That They Need on Great Occasions.

"Do you know what an immense amount of nervous energy people waste continually, which might be stored up?" asked a physician. "A very nervous person is apt to have little tricks of manner which she fancies are a help to her and cover her confusion, whereas they are really an injury and loss. A habit of wriggling in your chair, of twirling something in your fingers as you talk, of biting your lips or tapping on the floor with your foot or a hundred other things, it would be a decided gain to restrain.

"Very few people realize how rare a thing it is to sit perfectly still or to do things composedly without wasting any effort. An oculist who was examining a patient's eyes placed a chair and told her to be seated. Then immediately he asked her to get up again. 'Do you know that there isn't one person in a hundred who doesn't do that?' he asked. 'Do what?' she said, thoroughly mystified. 'Move the chair when sitting down. You moved it several inches and I wanted you in exactly that light.'

"Probably you never noticed this, yet observation confirms it. Now, why should anybody, having put her chair where she thinks she wants it, move it in the act of sitting down? It is from a habit of irresolution and nervousness, a failure to do just what she meant to—to make her intention go straight to the mark. Probably it is quite unconscious with most people.

"In learning to write or to draw you learn to steady your hand and draw lines which shall show no deviation or raggedness, but be always correct and firm. It is worth while to try to do everything in the same way, with no raggedness, no rambling off.

"But, as every nervous person knows, it seems almost impossible. You feel that if you are debarred from 'letting off steam' you must go crazy, or jump up or down, or scream, or do something to horrify or shock people.

"Well, but try it. Keep perfectly still. Don't twiddle your fingers, or shake your foot, or jerk your shoulder, or giggle, or clear your throat, or say unmeaning things because you are afraid to be silent. Keep it up minute after minute. You will be surprised to find how long you can do it.

"Then, when you cannot stand it any longer, make your escape and do some of the violent things you have in mind. You will find that you might have hysteria twice a week or break a window occasionally without using up half the nervous force that would leak out in these little unsuspected ways."—Pittsburg Dispatch.

Doctoring the Wild Animals.

Hospitals for cats and dogs are quite common in the large cities, and many a feline and canine pet has been successfully nursed through a severe illness by the expert doctors who spend their time in studying animal diseases. With the exception of wounds and injuries, the great majority of the complaints which the pets suffer from come as a direct result of too high living. Sweets, cake, candy and highly seasoned food will in the course of time make even the dumb brutes sick, and the animal doctors frequently find that all their patients need are a little physic and plain living. Two weeks of such common treatment generally restores the pets to health and strength again.

But of late years the importations to this country of wild animals for circuses, menageries and exhibitions of various kinds have been so large that there has sprung up a regular system of doctoring for wild animals. Their complaints generally are very few. At first they are homesick after leaving their forest jungles, and they pine away in their cages unless they are carefully watched. The wilder and fiercer ones refuse to be consoled, and they often injure themselves in their frantic efforts to break through their iron cage. Then the heat, change of climate and food and occasionally old age, bring on complaints that must be checked by expert physicians.—New York Epoch.

Afraid of Becoming Famous.

A manuscript reader for a leading magazine says: "The magazine with which I am connected employed a well known female writer to write up an interesting phase of life six years ago, for which she was to receive a stipulated sum of money. When her article was submitted the editor didn't like it and sent it back, but she fired it back again, demanding pay, and got it. The article was pigeonholed, and no one thought of it again until a short time ago, when the editor resurrected it and had it put in type, forgetting all about its origin. It appeared in a recent number of the magazine, and was discussed by literary people as being one of the best written articles published by the magazine in question. The editor of another magazine was attracted by the article and wrote to the lady asking her to submit matter to him. The writer appears to be a very spirited young woman, however, and refused to do so, saying that one experience with a magazine editor is enough. She says she will never write for them again. If she did she might become famous. She confines her efforts to newspaper work."—New York Cor. St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

A Wonderful Gold Mine.

One of the wonders of Australia, and one of the greatest natural curiosities in the world, is the Mount Morgan gold mine in Queensland. The precious metal contained in this mine, which has paid a dividend of not less than $6,000,000 in a year, was deposited by a hot spring.

Mount Morgan is a hill about 500 feet high, containing at its top a cup shaped deposit made by the hot spring which once gushed out there, and in this deposit the gold exists. Truly a cup of Cræsus! Through untold ages the waters dropped their glittering burden, and now man comes and extracts the hoarded metal to add to the wealth of the world.

Specimens of the ore from this strange mine have been sent to the United States, that they might be compared with the deposits of the great hot springs in our own Yellowstone park. It was but natural to suppose that the Yellowstone springs had also a golden treasure in their cups, but the most careful search by geologists has thus far failed to detect any trace of it.—Youth's Companion.

How a Bird Gets Light.

The baya bird of India spends his nights catching fireflies, with which he plasters his nest. The baya does not kill the fly, but simply attaches it to his nest by means of a piece of moist clay. On a dark night a baya's nest has the appearance of an electric street lamp.—St. Louis Republic.

Who He Liked Best.

The other day a conversation took place between two little children, a girl of seven and a boy of five. Girl (wishing to show her superior knowledge)—Which do you like best, Queen Victoria or Washington? Boy (simply)—I love mamma.—Cor. Babyhood.

DAMAGING EVIDENCE.

Unreliability of Circumstantial Testimony at Times.

HOW A POLANDER ESCAPED HANGING.

His Life Saved by the Unsuspiciousness of his Employer.—A Strange Case.

A party of men who had been discussing the abolition of the death penalty, and one of the number had just told of an execution by hanging of which he had been a witness, when John T. McDonough remarked:

"I have seen just one hanging in my life, and I issued the warrant for the arrest of the man I saw hanged. It was rather a remarkable case, and it taught me always to look upon purely circumstantial evidence as not very good."

"How is that? Let us hear the case," said one of the party.

"Well, it was like this. It was in 1872; I was quite young then, and had just been elected police justice in Dunkirk. One morning a German whom I knew came to me, bringing with him a Polander, and said:

"'This man tells a very strange story; either he is crazy or else a murder has been committed in Jamestown.'

"Naturally I was interested at once, and questioned the German. The Pole could not speak English, but he spoke a dialect of German, and had made his story intelligible to the German. The Pole's story, as interpreted to me, was about like this:

"He had been working for a man named Marlow, a well known brewer in Jamestown, who stood well in the community. Some days previous an acquaintance of his named Bachman had been stopping with him at Marlow's house. Marlow and Bachman had gone about town together considerably and had become quite well acquainted, apparently, in so short a time. One evening Marlow asked the Pole if Bachman had any money about him. The Pole replied that he thought he had. He thought Marlow's question a queer one at the time, but soon forget about it until subsequent events recalled it to his mind.

"The next day the Pole was working about Marlow's place as usual when Marlow and Bachman came up from the village together. Bachman carried a parcel. When they reached the house they went into the cellar together, and remained there a long time. Then the Pole heard what sounded to him like a shot. Soon afterward Marlow came out of the cellar alone. About that time some one drove up with a wagon to get a barrel of beer. Instead of sending the Pole into the cellar for it, as he usually did, Marlow went himself to fetch it. When he reappeared with it the Pole noticed a spot of blood upon it and another on Marlow's clothing. Then he began to think that something awful had been done. After the customer had driven away with his beer Marlow ordered the Pole to hitch up a team and drive to the woods after a load of wood. This order added to the Pole's suspicions, for there was no particular need of going for wood at that time. However, he went.

"When he returned, one of the first things he noticed was that there had been a fire in the furnace under the brewing kettle. The embers were still smoldering. There was another strange circumstance. No brewing had been done. There was a quantity of water in the kettle which had become heated, but that was all. The Pole, who, though he could not speak in English, could think and reason quite fluently in Polish, began to put together all that he had heard and seen that seemed to him unaccountable or strange, at least, and drew from it a conclusion that was as yet vague, but suggested something horrible.

THE HIRED MAN TELLS.

"The next morning the Pole asked Marlow to allow him to take a day off. He said it was a holiday among his people and he wanted to visit some of his acquaintances. Marlow gave his consent, and the Pole started off. Instead of visiting his friends he took the first train for Dunkirk and sought for some one to tell his story to. For a long time he was unsuccessful, as no one could understand him. Finally he found the German, who brought him to me.

"Well, you may believe that the story impressed me. It was told in a straightforward manner, and there was nothing about the man to indicate mental derangement. Still I hesitated to issue a warrant, for Marlow, as I said, was a citizen of good standing, and it seemed impossible that he could have committed such a crime. I went to an old judge, to whom I frequently applied for advice, and laid the matter before him. He listened with great interest. 'Issue the warrant,' he said. I took the necessary affidavits, filled out the warrant and gave it to an officer, with instructions to go to Jamestown with it. When we reached the depot where the train was ready and about to start we learned that Marlow's brother-in-law, who lived in Dunkirk, was already aboard. Evidently he had got wind of what was going on, and was going to warn Marlow. We had him taken from the train and detained while the officer went on. To make sure, we telegraphed to the Jamestown authorities to arrest Marlow for murder. In a short time we received an answer in the form of a question. 'Do you mean Marlow, the brewer?' said the dispatch. 'Yes, Marlow, the brewer,' we replied.

"When our officer reached Jamestown Marlow was under arrest nominally. The whole affair was regarded as a joke, however. Marlow's friends chaffed him and he laughed loudest at their raillery. Our officer presented his papers. The deputy who had arrested Marlow looked them over. 'Your papers are all right, but you're all wrong; Marlow wouldn't hurt a fly,' he said. Then our officer told his story. A party started to examine the ashes in Marlow's furnace. In a few moments some one had found a kneecap. Bones of fingers and other portions of a human skeleton were discovered. Then there was no more chaffing, and Marlow was under arrest in earnest.

"On the trial the defence admitted the killing, but said that it was done by Marlow's wife, who struck Bachman on the head with a hammer because he insulted her mother while Marlow was away from home. But after the killing had once been admitted the jury took no stock in that story, especially in view of the testimony given by the Pole. Marlow was convicted and hanged.

"I thought then, and I still think, that if Marlow had had any suspicion that the Pole suspected him and intended to inform the authorities he could have turned the charge against the Pole without any difficulty. If a man of Marlow's standing had accused the Pole of murdering Bachman—he would have had his wife corroborate whatever story he might have prepared—nothing in the world could have saved the Pole from the gallows. Since then I have thought little of circumstantial evidence."—Albany Express.

Punishment Accepted.

The Rev. William Dow, a good man and an able minister, having adopted certain doctrinal opinions which were thought to be heretical, was called to stand his trial before the general assembly of the Established church of Scotland. Being sure that he would be deposed from the ministry, he thus addressed his country congregation on the Sunday before he went to his trial:

"You all know that to-morrow I leave this place to go to Edinburgh, and to stand my trial before the general assembly. The result I know will be that I shall be turned out of my parish, and that this is the last time I shall address you as your minister. This you all know.

"But there is one thing about myself which you do not know, but which I will tell you. When I first came here to be your minister I found difficulty in obtaining a house to live in. There was but one house in the parish I could have that was suitable, and that was inhabited by a poor widow.

"I went and offered a higher rent for her house than she paid. She was dispossessed, and I got the house. I put that poor woman out of her house then, and I hold it to be a righteous thing in God to put me out of my parish now."

That minister may have been a "heretic," but he was a Christian with the manliness to confess his sin and take his punishment without whining.—Youth's Companion.

A Broadway Episode.

Opposite the Western Union building on Broadway stands, day in and day out, a dark complexioned man whose business is to sell a patent garter for men. He wears knee breeches in order to show how the garter is adjusted. As he stands there on the sidewalk day after day the sight of his calves have become a tolerably familiar spectacle to the frequenters of lower Broadway.

Yesterday an old lady who had crossed over the Cortlandt street ferry came along and her attention was at once attracted to this unusual sight. The man stands on the inside of the walk, and the old lady, taking up her stand on the curb, stood looking at him for a time as if transfixed.

"For the land sakes!" she finally exclaimed, "if that don't beat anything I ever seed. I thought it was some kind of a scandalous sign at first, but may I be blest if it haint a livin' man!"

Going up to the garter man she shook her umbrella over his head and said:

"Young feller, take the advice of a woman old enough to be your mother, an' go home an' put on some decent clothes. If you'd cut up any of them monkey shines over in Hackensack you would git the blamed head knocked offen you before you knowed what hit you!" and she passed up the street the awful incarnation of indignant womanhood.—New York World.

Books Read in the Farm House.

A fair idea of what books the people of New England most read and most delight in is afforded by a test made by The Springfield Homestead, an agricultural journal widely circulated in New England country towns. It requested its readers to send in a list of what they considered the ten "best" books, and a large number of replies were received. The different books voted for amounted to over a thousand. There were 146 different books receiving one vote apiece. The ten books which were on the greatest number of lists were as follows: "Ben Hur," by Gen. Wallace; "Ramona," by Helen Hunt Jackson; "David Copperfield," by Charles Dickens; "Ivanhoe," by Walter Scott; "Uncle Tom's Cabin," by Harriet Beecher Stowe; "Little Women," by Louisa M. Alcott; "John Halifax," by Dinah Mulock Craik; "Looking Backward," by Edward Bellamy; "Jane Eyre," by Charlotte Bronte, and "Adam Bede," by George Eliot.

Good Advice.

Joseph Joslin, Esq., of Poultney, Vt., gave his daughter, on her marriage, the following "words of wisdom," which will do for every pair:

Never talk at, but to, each other.

Never both manifest anger at the same time.

Never speak loudly or boisterously to each other.

Never reprove each other in the presence of others.

Never find fault or fret at what cannot be helped.

Never repeat an order or request, when understood.

Neglect everybody else rather than each other.

Walking Stick Plantations.

Walking sticks are, to a great extent, imported into England from abroad. The number received from other countries reaches nearly 5,000,000 annually, with a combined value of about £25,000.

Commoner sticks, as those of beech, ash, thorn and hazel, are, to a great extent, grown in this country. In Gloucestershire, for instance, many acres are devoted to no other purpose than the raising of wood for the walking stick market.

A peculiar branch of this business is the importation of overgrown cabbage stalks from the Channel Islands, where cabbages are regularly trained with a view to being transformed into walking sticks by a process of stripping off each leaf as it appears, and finally drying and hardening the stems.—London Tit-Bits.

Some Odd Ideas of Crime.

Did you ever stop to think of the absurdity of this thing we call "crime against society?" Some one breaks into your house, steals your money, the savings of years, and leaves you helpless. Or some one gets you to indorse his note, leaves you to pay it, and ruins you financially. This is called an offense against society, the man is dangerous and must be punished and restrained. He is sent to prison for twenty years—so as to give him ample time to repent—set to work, and the proceeds of his labor taken by society. Where are you? You are really the one against whom the offense was committed—you are the only sufferer. Why, then, not let the earnings of his labor go to reimburse you?—Kansas City Times.

New Pattern of Boots.

Italian boot factories are manufacturing boots of a singular pattern. The heels and soles are not sewn on, but riveted to the uppers in such a way that if the heels are worn down on one side they can be taken off and turned round; worn soles can be removed in the same way and new ones put on. Nothing is needed now but an Italian invention for turning our trousers around so as to put the bags in the knees behind us.—Chatter.

Speaking Literally.

Goslin—Hello, old man! how are you? I haven't seen much of you lately.

Maddox—You have seen more of me than I have of you.

"How do you make that out?"

"Well, I'm much bigger than you."—Harper's Bazar.

HARE GOD AND THE SUN.

Curious Indian Legend of How the Earth Was Flooded.

THE GOD STARTS OUT TO SLAY THE SUN

Because the Latter Burned His Back.—Havoc he Created.

Traditions of a great deluge which at one time covered the earth are found in almost all ages and all religions. It is the culmination of Rajnarok of the Norse Sagas and of Wagner's "Twilight of the Gods." The Algonquins believe that the summit of Mount Washington was the only portion of the world that was not immersed in the flood, and that it was a place of refuge for an Indian and his wife, who became the Adam and Eve of the Indian race. The following legend of the southwestern Indians gives a singular origin of the flood, and is told in the simple and childish fashion peculiar to savage people. The incidents of the journey suggest the Brer Rabbit and his contemporaries in negro fable.

As the Hare God slept one day the sun burned his back, and waking in wrath he set out to fight the aggressor. On the way he became hungry and took some corn, and when those who had planted it found that it had been stolen they set off in pursuit. The Hare God burrowed into the ground, and when his pursuers shot their arrows into the hole he turned them aside with his magic breath. When they began to dig for him he made his way by a secret passage to a gallery in a rock above, and when they had dug far down he hurled his magic ball and caved the earth in on their heads.

"You are buried in a hole that you dug for yourselves," he shouted. "Fighting is like eating to me. I have set out to kill. Everyone I meet will be my enemy. Nobody shall escape my wrath."

Next day he saw two men heating rocks and chipping arrow heads from them. "Let me help you," he said, "for hot rocks can't burn me." "Would you have us think that you are a ghost?" they replied. "No, but I am a better man than you. Hold me on these rocks, and if I don't burn you must let me do the same to you."

The men complied, and heating the stones to redness they placed him on them, failing to see that by his magic breath he kept a current of air between him and the surface. Rising unhurt he demanded that they should submit to the torture and they did so. When their flesh had been burned to the entrails, and they were dead, he sounded his war whoop and went on.

Next day he met two women picking berries, and bade them blow the leaves and thorns into his eyes. They did so, but his magic breath saved his eyeballs. "You are a ghost," the women cried. "No ghost," he answered, "but a common person. Leaves and thorns can do no harm. Let me show you," and he puffed the thorns into their faces and blinded them. "Aha, you are caught with your own chaff. I am on my way to kill the Sun. This is good practice." And he slew them, sounded his war whoop and went on.

Next day he saw two women making water jugs of willow baskets lined with pitch, and heard one of them say, "Here comes that bad Hare God. How shall we destroy him?" "What were you saying?" asked the Hare God, coming up. "We said, 'Here comes our grandson' (a common form of endearment)." "Is that all? Let me get into the water jug. Now braid the neck." They braided the neck very small and laughed to think they had entrapped him, but with his magic breath he burst his prison and offered to braid jugs about them to prove that while they could hold water they could not hold men and women.

POWER OF THE MAGIC BALL.

They consented, and when the jugs were finished he told them to jump out. Try as they might they could not break the willow withes, and he rolled them about, laughing and deriding them for their folly. "You are bottled in your own jugs," said he. "I am on my way to slay the Sun. In time I shall learn how." Then, killing them with his magic ball, he sounded the war whoop and went on.

Next day he met the Bear, who was digging a hole to hide in, for he had heard of the Hare God and was afraid. "Don't fear," said the Hare God. "I am not the man to hide from. How could a little fellow like me hurt so many people?" And he helped the Bear to dig his den, but when it was finished he hid behind a rock and as the Bear thrust his head near him he launched his ball at his face and made an end of him. "I was afraid of this warrior, but now he is dead in his own den," said the Hare God, and sounding his war whoop he went on.

Next day he met the Tarantula, a knowing fellow, who had a club that would deal a fatal blow to others, but would not hurt himself. He began to groan as the Hare God came near, and cried that he had a pain, caused by an evil spirit, in his head, and asked to have it beaten out. The Hare God took the weapon and whacked soundly, but when the Tarantula shouted, "Harder," he guessed that the club was enchanted and changed it for his magic ball, which finished the Tarantula at once. "That is a blow of your own seeking," remarked the slayer. "I am on my way to kill the Sun. Now I know I can do it." And sounding his war whoop he went on.

Next day he came to the edge of the world and looked off into the space where thousands of careless people had fallen, and there he passed the night under a little tree. With the coming of the dawn he stood on the brink of the earth and the instant that the Sun appeared he flung the magic ball full in his face. The Sun was broken into a thousand pieces that spattered over the earth and kindled a mighty conflagration. The Hare God crept under the tree that had sheltered him on the night before, but that was of no avail against the increasing heat. He tried to run away, but the fire burned off his toes, then his feet, then his legs, then his body, so that he ran on his hands, and when his hands were burned off he walked on the stumps of his arms. At last only his head was left and that rolled along over hill and valley until it struck a rock, when the eyes burst and the tears that rushed forth spread over the land, putting out the flames but creating a flood. When the deluge had subsided the Sun was conquered, and at his trial before the other gods was scolded for his conduct and condemned after that to travel across the sky every day by the same trail.—Brooklyn Eagle.

A Rat's Queer Hiding Place.

Miss Eva McFadden, of Oxford, had an adventure with a rat one day recently. She took a loaf of bread from the pantry, and when about to cut it a rat jumped out of it and scampered around until the family cat settled its capers. The animal had eaten a hole into the loaf and ensconced itself therein.—Philadelphia Ledger.

Labor Commissioner Osborn of Pennsylvania has been examining into the condition of laborers in the coke and coal industries of his State. He found that 95 per cent of the laborers were Huns, Slavs and Poles, who could speak no English and were tagged and numbered like so many cattle that one might be distinguished from another. But 5 percent are native born Americans. How these protected industries do protect American labor! These degraded foreigners are huddled together in hovels and work in the coal pits or at the furnaces without regard to sex or the decencies of civilization. The contract labor law is a dead letter with the coal barons and these foreign slaves are imported in great numbers to take the place of American workmen at starvation wages. How is this class of immigrants going to effect our American civilization? When will American laborers understand the true inwardness of the pretensions of tariff protected monopolists? The campaign is coming on. Get out your banners and inscribe them with "Republicanism and Protection to American Laborers" if you wisl. to perpetuate and extend the condition of things which now obtains in the coal and coke industries of Pennsylvania.

The question of amending the Constitution of the United States so as to make the Presidential term six years and make the President ineligible to to office a second term, has much to commend it. The temptation to prostitute the immense power of federal patronage for the purpose of controlling the party convention is a strong one, and one which few, if any, Presidents have resisted when the necessity has arisen for its exercise. No matter how popopular a President may be, it is difficult to find leadership and give shape to the opposition so long as he holds such an immense power to reward his supporters and punish his enemies. The President himself on the other hand would feel more free to act according to his own best judgment if he were not always beset by clamerous spoilsmen, holding always before him the terror of their vindictive opposition for refusing to reward their services or recognize their claims. He would thus be free from the temptation to misuse the power of his office to coerce support or to wield his own conceptions of official duty to placate unfortunate political marauders. There is some weight also to be attached to the fact that every year of intense political excitement is a year of business depression, and the too frequent recurrence of exciting political contests is apt to keep the business of the country in a state of feverish unres).

Reports from Sacramento state that serious trouble is anticipated among the Chinese of that city. The police were notified that after the burial of the victim of last Monday night's shooting scrape hostilities would be resumed. When the murdered Chinaman was interred about a hundred highbinders marched to the cemetery and on the corpse of the murded cigar maker swore to avenge his tragic death. At a meeting of the Bing Hong Tong it is said that open war was declared on the police, Officer Higgins being selected as the first victim, he having incurred the special enmity of the tong by capturing their records and exposing the secrets of the league of cut-throats and assassins. It is to be hoped that Sacramento will be resolute in dealing with this evil which is menacing her. If the police force are insufficient to cope with these alien bravos and murderers the people should organize and come to the aid of the authorities and make such a thorough job of exterminating the highbinders that Sacramento will be shunned by the fraternity for the next quarter of a century. It would be interesting to know what the advocates of Chinese immigration think of this recent development, but they are keeping discreetly silent. Here is a gang of the most bloodthirsty creatures imaginable actually threatening to put to death the police of a city because in the discharge of their duty they check the lawlessness of these wretches. A nice, harmless, inoffensive fellow the "little brown man" is indeed. Perhaps some of the Eastern cities would like such an experience as that through which Sacramento seems destined to pass.

THE BIG LAGOON.

An Interesting Formation on the Northern Coast of California.

On the northern coast of California, some thirty miles below the month of the Klamath river, is one of the most interesting natural formations to be found in this country, known as the Big lagoon. Here the coast, which runs north and south up to this point, takes a sharp turn inland, bordered by very high hills, running to a distance of about three miles, then turning out again makes a sharp bay almost V shaped, and for ages past a sand bar has been washing itself up across this bay until the bar has raised up out of the water some ten or twelve feet, having a width of about 100 feet and a length of four miles, reaching across the entire bay.

This bar is in the shape of a roof. When there is a storm the breakers will roll up one side of it, break over, and run down into the bay inside, and it is a novel sight to stand there and watch the waters, mountain high on one side and perfectly calm on the other, the line between the two at intervals hidden altogether.

This bar is a sort of short cut and can be traversed on horseback. In a storm the horseman will one minute be high and dry on land, the next minute a large wave will roll up and running under the horse's feet to the depth of a foot or more, the rider will be for an instant four miles or so at sea on horseback, with no land nearer than the high bluffs of the mainland in sight.

Moss agates may be found in abundance on the pebbly beach, and when the sun shines they glitter with dazzling brightness.

The wild duck that frequent this part of the coast literally fill this inland bay, and the passing hunter, should he take a shot at them, will raise such a cloud and such a quacking that he will think all the ducks of the earth have gathered there. Occasionally some wild beast like a bear or a panther will be found crossing this bar, and the Indians have much sport when such a thing happens, the animal rarely escaping capture or death.

Here the Digger Indians abound, living on the shellfish, which they catch along the beach, seldom going over the ridge of hills to capture a deer, which are plentiful. It would astonish a Yale or Harvard football man to come upon this scene some bright morning at low tide and see the squaws and children playing lacrosse on the beach. They get so excited with their sport that they keep it up until the tide drives them from the beach, often staying there until they have to chase the ball down into the surf.—Detroit Free Press.

How New York Appears to a Foreigner.

Of the ugliness, confusedness and shabbiness of New York nothing new can be said; but full justice is done to the Central park, which in another generation will be the most beautiful public resort in the world. It would, however, be altogether unfair to judge of America by New York; no other town in the Union can vie with it in dirt, inconvenience and meanness of appearance.—London Spectator.

Writing Letters Without Sight.

A woman whose eyesight has passed almost beyond the failing point finds such relief in using the ridged tablets upon which paper is laid that she says all nearly blind persons should do likewise. "They have made letter writing a pleasure," she says, "where before it was a pain. I put a pin in where I leave off, and I can begin right again after any interruption.—New York Times.

...ave you will see this. If you are sent, wisdom and intelligent application suggest itself to-day, I propose you my work, personal attention. I undertake to thoroughly teach any fairly intelligent person of either sex, who can read and write, and who, after instruction, will work industriously, how to earn Three Thousand Dollars a year in their own localities, wherever they live. I will also furnish the situation or employment, at which you can earn that amount. I charge nothing for my services, and receive nothing unless successful, as above. Nothing difficult to learn, or that requires much time. I desire but one person from each district or county. I have already taught and provided with employment a large number who are making over Three Thousand Dollars a Year, each. All is new, solid, sure. Full particulars free. After you know all, if you conclude to go no further, why, no harm is done. Address, E. C. ALLEN, Box 420, Augusta, Maine.

The Board of Education met during the week.

Billy McDonald of Big Pine was in town during the week.

E. Spencer Esq. of Big Pine is visiting at Independence.

Henry Rhine was elected school trustee last Tuesday, vice O. I. Mairs.

Mrs. Eunice Johnson, accompanied by her son, Pierce, arrived from Los Angeles yesterday, coming by way of Keeler.

Mrs. J. B. Steward came down from Big Pine on Tuesday on business connected with the estate of her late husband.

Mrs. Emma Jiggins and her little son returned on Tuesdays train after an extended visit through California.

S. G. Sueden Esq., of Bishop spent several days in town this week. It is reported that he will be a candidate for District Attorney on the Republican side of the fence.

"Mr. and Mrs. Louis V. Olcese" was the legend accompanying a box of wedding cake received at this office last Monday. We wish the young couple a long and prosperous life.

The Native Sons will give a social dance on the Fourth of July. The same society propose giving at least two dramatic entertainments during Fair week, of which due notice will be given.

Attention is directed to the change in the advertisement of the Pioneer Blacksmith Shop. F. W. Bedford has leased the business for one year and will endeavor to give satisfaction to all patrons.

Work will be commenced next week toward fixing up a race track for use this fall. This will be a step in the right direction, as it takes considerable time to put a track in suitable condition.

Jerry Mairs and Dan Tressell came down from Fish Springs on Wednesday to get material for completing arastras. Jerry says the new water wheel is a daisy, and they will soon be taking out the yellow stuff.

The only important news from the National Convention is that Major McKinley was elected permanent chairman. The time since then has been occupied with the reports of various committees. No nomination for President has yet been made.

Mr. and Mrs. J. J. Gunn and little daughter expect to go north on to-morrow's train. Mr. Gunn will go to Ottawa, Canada to visit his relatives, whom he has not seen for fifteen years. Mrs. Gunn and daughter will visit her sister, Mrs. Butler, at San Francisco.

John N. Yandell announces himself this week as a candidate for County Clerk. Mr. Yandell is the present incumbent, and during his term of office his unfailing courtesy has won for him many friends. He is always accommodating and obliging and should prove a strong candidate for re-election.

The judgment rendered by Judge Rooney in favor of the plaintiff in the the Broder—Conklin case has been set aside by the Superior Court of Mono County, in which Court the said case is now pending on transfer from this county. The cause has been placed on the calender, and a new trial will be had.

The communication published in this week's Index from H. M. Yerington, with the comment thereon, places the railroad magnate and his parasite in an amusing and absurd position. To begin with, the Index says it "has no special interest in the controversy." The only interpretation of this is that Mr. Craig is not only willing but anxious to pose as the dispenser of railroad favors and the medium of railroad patronage to Inyo county. The Index has never denied the imputation of being an out and out railroad institution. In the present instance it endeavors to make "a good sneak," shifting the entire question upon the shoulders of Mr. Yerington, and trying in a weakly ludicrous manner to divert the attention of the people of Inyo from the fact which the INDEPENDENT has clearly established, namely: That the Index is pursuing, and will continue to pursue, any course which will benefit the railroad and prove most acceptable to its managers, regardless of how the interests of the people of this Valley may be affected thereby. That was the sole object aimed at by the recent articles in this paper, and as Mr. Craig has proved himself unable to deny any of the charges made the fact becomes firmly established in the minds of the people. The Index says it is able to take care of itself. It betrays an utter inability to do so by dragging in Mr. Yerington. That gentleman says he would not have noticed the INDEPENDENT did he not think that Mr. Craig needed taking care of. His letter is written, so he affirms, wholly and solely in the interest of Mr. Craig—he couldn't stand it to see his favorite exposed. And Mr. Craig is so ungenerous, after Mr. Yerington kindly volunteers to help him, as to say that he don't need it! My dear local cotem., don't crawfish; you are a self-convicted railroad tool, so stand up and take your gruel like the nice and smooth little gentleman you are. You can't sneak out of the "controversy" by dodging between the legs of H. M. Yerton. You are "in it"—pretty muchly.

There is but one point in Mr. Yerington's letter which we feel called upon to answer: He says that the INDEPENDENT and the Index receive exactly the same pay from the C. & C. R. R. This can allude but to one thing: Both papers publish a railroad time card; this is a business proposition and an advertisement from the railroad company must be paid for just the same as any other business concern. The advertising columns of this paper are open to any respectable individual, firm or corporation who desires the space and will pay for it. We have been the sole editor and proprietor of the INDEPENDENT for just one year, and during that time we have not received one cent from the C. & C. R. R. Our advertising bill will be forwarded to the railroad managers at the close of the year, just as to all other patrons, and we shall expect them to pay it just the same as any other business enterprise. The trifling amount paid to all of the papers in the county for publishing the railroad time card cuts no figure in this question. There is scarcely a man in Inyo county but believes that the Index is subsidized by the railroad company. It is impossible, of course, to produce any proof of the amount paid. This fact is evident, however: Mr. Craig was made Register of the Land Office through Mr. Yerington's influence and despite the protest of old time Republican leaders. When a Receiver was to be appointed Mr. Craig went to Bishop and stated that any man he might name would receive the appointment, and the result bore out the truth of the assertion; this also through the connection of Mr. Yerington with the great political railroad ring of Stanford & Co. It is a well known fact that none of the Republican war-horses of Inyo county, those who have led and supported the party for twenty years and more, have any voice or influence in directing official patronage. The great railroad power extends even to this far-off county and their servant here performs their bidding and is recompensed by the perquisites they throw in his way. As to the effect the C. & C. R. R. has upon Inyo county, as we have said before, every man must judge for himself. We do not choose at this time to go into that question.

The Supreme Court has again, on a rehearing, decided that Supervisors have no authority to allow county officers to hire deputies to be paid out of the County Treasury. Officers requiring deputies must pay them out of their own pockets or do the work themselves. The next Legislature will have another tinkering job on the County Government Act. It is to be hoped that Inyo County will this year give us a liberal minded and justly inclined Assemblyman, as the Rebublicans of that county have the naming of the candidate for the next term. The salaries of Mono county are ridiculously low. The Tax Collector, who has to give a $30,000 bond and is employed ten months in the year collecting State and county taxes, receives the enormous salary of $300 a year. If such a salary is not an invitation to an officer to steal, it is coming mighty close to it. And the same may be said of the Treasurer who gets $600.—Chronicle Union.

The recent decision is very clear upon the point that no county officer can be allowed a deputy to be paid out of county funds additional to the salary of the principal. In this county the only deputy so allowed is the Assessor's, and should the Auditor draw a warrant for the extra salary or the Treasurer pay same when drawn, suits will be instituted against their bondsmen to recover the same. The proper course for the Auditor to pursue is to refuse to draw any warrant for extra salary and let the assessor commence suit to compel him to draw the same. The Auditor and his bondsmen will then be on the safe side, and the case will be thoroughly tested.

In a recent letter to the proprietors, Mr. H. M. Bangs, the druggist at Chatsworth, Ill., says: "I am very much pleased with Chamberlain's Cough Remedy. During the epidemic of la grippe here it took the lead and was very much better liked than other cough medicines." The grip requires precisely the same treatment as a very severe cold, for which this remedy is so efficient. It will promptly loosen a cold and relieve the lungs, soon effecting a cure, while most other medicines in common use for colds only give temporary relief; 50 cent bottles for sale by

On Wednesday evening a telegram was received at Independence stating that a Mexican had shot and killed Tom Lehy at Mono Lake. Lehy was Major-domo for J. N. Evans, who offers $200 reward for the capture of his slayer. The Mexican is well known about Bishop. He worked at one time for Frank Shaw and was the owner of the race horse, Jesse James. Sheriff Gorman and Under-Sheriff Holland are both out looking for him. He is supposed to have gone south.

George Lewis came up from Darwin early in the week. He says his water supply is shut off and he can do nothing until the pipes are repaired.

Splendid Tribute

THE SAN FRANCISCO BOARD OF HEALTH

URGES THE USE OF THE Royal Baking Powder.

The magnificent tribute of the San Francisco Board of Health to the great purity and wholesomeness of the Royal Baking Powder greatly disturbs the manufacturers of the lower grade powders. Their envious publications, however, cannot break the force of this unsolicited and unbiassed, high medical endorsement. Attached is a certified copy of their original report, with the signatures of the members of the Board in fac-simile:

We, the members of The Board of Health of the City and County of San Francisco, cordially approve and recommend the Royal Baking Powder. It is absolutely pure and healthful, composed of the best ingredients of the highest strength and character.

In our judgment it is impossible to make a purer or stronger Baking Powder than the "Royal."

Ask your doctor what happens to cod-liver oil when it gets inside of you.

He will say it is shaken and broken up into tiny drops, becomes an emulsion; there are other changes, but this is the first.

He will tell you also that it is economy to take the oil broken up, as it is in Scott's Emulsion, rather than burden yourself with this work. You skip the taste too.

TO HIM WHO WAITS.

To him who waits amid the world's applause
His share of justice, toiling day by day,
All things will come now dim and far away
To him who waits.

To him who waits beyond the darkness drear
The morning cometh with refulgent light,
Bringing assurance of a day more bright
To him who waits.

To him who waits, though tears may often fall,
And knees be bowed in sorrow and in prayer,
All grief will end, and everything be fair
To him who waits.

To him who waits, and reaches out his hands
To aid a toiler up life's beetling crags,
Surcease will come from every ill that flags
To him who waits.

To him who waits, and struggles not in vain
To overcome the evils that abound
Within his breast, sweet will the victory sound
To him who waits.

To him who waits there comes a wily throng,
Who sneer and scoff and look with baleful eyes.
But what of them? They are but gnats and flies
To him who waits.

To him who waits there must be recompense
For useful work, whatever may betide,
A compensation reaching far and wide
To him who waits.

To him who waits the stars are always friends,
The restless ocean and the azure sky,
All things in nature speak and prophesy
To him who waits.

To him who waits true love will some day come,
And lay an offering at his blameless shrine;
Life will be love, and love will be divine,
To him who waits.

To him who waits the world will some day cheer,
And sing his praises; Fame's mysterious gates
Will open for him; heaven seem more near,
To him who waits.

MR. BARNES' NEW WIFE.

"I declare she's the han'somest woman 't walks into the Ransom meet'n house. Barnes must of had his eyes open when he picked her out."

It was Mr. Whiting who expressed this opinion. He and his wife were picking early peas in their "nigh garden," as they called the patch nearest the house.

Mrs. Whiting did not reply immediately, but she went on with her work with such energy that the pea vines suffered at her hands. When her husband repeated with unction "the han'somest woman" she exclaimed:

"I heard ye plain 'nough, Zenas. You're jest like the rest of the men. They all think they never seen nothin' like her. 'N' she does look well, I ain't disputin' of that."

"'N' her figger!" unwisely went on Mr. Whiting, as he dropped a handful of pea pods into the pan; "'n' her walk. We ain't seen no such in Ransom sence that woman from New Orleans was boarding down to the Bankses. Where did you say he found her?"

"Over beyond Bellin'ham, Sarah Ripley said. She knows of her folks," was the unenthusiastic reply.

After awhile Mr. Whiting brought another handful of pods, and said that "women was odd. He didn't see, for his part, why they couldn't own up when they seen a face 'n' figger like Barnes' new wife. 'Twouldn't hurt 'em none."

Mrs. Whiting straightened herself up from the vines. She looked intently at the currant bushes, and apparently addressed her remarks to them:

"'Tain't no use to try to make men know anything," she said. Then glancing down at her husband, who was sitting on his heels and very busy, she continued:

"I'm thinkin' of his first wife. Poor Marshy! It's jest thirteen months 'n' six days sence she died, 'n' a blessed release to her! I hope she's with her son Barney. If there's any justice in God's laws she's a-resting with her son."

The woman spoke with almost tearful earnestness. She turned and looked toward the tall white house that stood behind its elms and lilacs a short distance down the road.

"I tell you, Zenas, 'f I know anything 'bout folks by their faces Sam Barnes 'll have a dif'runt time with his second wife from what he did with his first. I hope he will, 'n' I shall see it. It'll do me a sight of good to have him stan' roun'. Let him take his turn, I say. He's had most thirty year bein' boss."

"'N' yet Barnes is a good, fair 'n' square man to deal with, 'n' a regular member of the church," said Mr. Whiting.

"I know all that," responded Mrs. Whiting, "but you ain't never ben his wife."

"No more ain't you," said Zenas, with his comfortable laugh.

"Thank the Lord for that!" was the fervent answer.

Then the two glanced at each other, and in their eyes was something which might have led an observer to believe that after all marriage was not always a failure.

When both were steadily and silently at work again there was heard a voice from the other side of the wall where the road lay.

"I didn't mean to begin to borrow so soon, Mrs. Whiting, but will you lend me a nutmeg? I want to make some dried apple pie. Mr. Barnes is fond of hot pie for supper."

The man and woman in the garden stood up suddenly.

Leaning on the wall in an indolent attitude was a tall woman whose figure hinted somewhat at redundance, but whose corset confined her waist so that as yet the hint was not too pronounced. The dark, thin gown was very plain, but fitted with a perfection never seen in Ransom, except perhaps in the case of that "lady from New Orleans." The people in this town were not in the habit of seeing a woman's shoulders and hips accentuated in that way, and to the feminine rural mind there almost seemed something immodest in a gown like that. "It was so dif'runt, you know." But they couldn't help admiring the effect and envying.

Mrs. Whiting recovered her powers of speech so that she could bid the other "come right in," for she had plenty of nutmegs, and she knew dried apple pies were mighty flat things without a good deal of spice.

Mrs. Barnes went round to the back gate and sauntered down the path. She stopped and spoke to Whiting and smiled at him. She was one of those whose voice and glance keep their special sweetness for men. Without having a distinctly formulated belief, she always acted on the supposition that men might be "worth while, but that women never were." Her eyes were large and dark, and they were both hard and voluptuous. Her mouth was thin and pale lipped, but it was very expressive.

Mr. Whiting, replying to her word and smile, watched her as she disappeared in the house. He wished to follow her, but he kept on with his work. He told himself that Sam Barnes was a thunderin' lucky man, and he wondered if that was the kind of women they had out beyond Bellin'ham.

A few days later Sarah Ripley announced that not only had the "new Mis' Barnes" been married before, but that she had been married twice before. Her first husband had died and was buried. The history of her second husband was not, however, so straightforward. He had neglected to die and be buried, and was roaming at large in the world. He had run away from her. It was said that he had declared before disappearing that "if Charlotte wasn't the devil she was jest as good as the devil."

This was strong language, and no wonder the man had not returned after having made use of it.

Sarah Ripley paid a visit to that remote town whence Mr. Barnes had brought his wife, and when Sarah returned she was much sought after by the whole feminine neighborhood. She was not reticent in regard to the information she had gleaned. She said that Mr. Fickett, the second husband, had been heard of "out west somewhere;" that Mr. Barnes had spent a pile of money in getting a divorce from him for Charlotte, so that he, Barnes, could wed Charlotte, for he was regularly bewitched with her. "There had never been no man so bewitched before," Sarah said confidentially to each person to whom she related the tale. "Folks did say he was jest like a man run crazy. He had been heard to declare by three dif'runt people that he'd spend every cent he'd got but what Charlotte should have that bill and be free to marry. 'N' Fickett'd ben jest so 'fore he got her. I d' know what there is 'bout her, but some women be so."

Thus said Miss Sarah Ripley, concerning whom no man, in all her 40 years of life, had ever "run crazy."

For two or three months Mr. Barnes went around like a man in a state of beatitude. He even sold his pigs at less than the market price, having for the first time in his life neglected to inform himself what the "goin' price" really was. Worse than that, when informed that the trader had taken advantage of his ignorance he had smiled happily and had replied that "he guessed it didn't make no odds." Several neighbors were sharp enough to improve this lapse and to get a few "good bargains out of Sam Barnes."

There were changes in the house, too; it was painted and papered and refurnished. It was opened also. The sacred "south parlor" was a sight to see, with its plush chairs in place of the horsehair, and with its open doors and blinds. Mrs. Barnes said she didn't like to do heavy housework, and they had a hired girl who kept the neighborhood informed as to the progress of Sam's infatuation. There were visitors, too, and brisk talk and laughter were heard from among those clumps of lilac.

Mrs. Whiting watched all these proceedings with unfailing intensity of interest. She said she wanted to see them folks over there git to the end of their rope. They'd git, she and she thought it would be sooner rather than later. When Sam Barnes got over his blindness he'd just put his foot down agin, 'n' folks would stop giggling' there."

In the course of the summer it was rumored that Mr. Barnes had "mortgaged his house." On the very same day at a Baptist picnic there ran a whisper all through the company that "Mis' Barnes went to bed every night with her face tied up in a raw beefsteak."

"Porterhouse?" questioned the minister when this news was told to him. But whether the steak were porterhouse or plebeian "round" was never really ascertained, owing to the remissness of the hired girl.

In those days Mrs. Whiting returned, after some fluctuations, to her belief that after all Mrs. Barnes would be too much for her husband and he could never resume his sway again. She was growing thin and he had now lost his beatified expression. When he went to meetin' with his wife it was generally noticed that he no longer sat so close to her in the pew and he did not look at her so often, but her smile seemed just as sweet, and she was often bestowing that smile upon her husband.

"I guess things is kinder settlin' down over ter Barnes'," said Mr. Whiting, "but he never'll be the same man ag'in. Whose buggy's that?"

He stepped out from the back door that he might see more plainly a dashing black horse and glittering buggy which were stopping at his gate. Mrs. Whiting ran to the front entry and peeped out. She saw a man alight from the buggy and carefully hitch the horse to the post. He was smoking a very long, thick cigar. He had on yellow gloves with broad black stitching on the backs; also a tall silk hat, so glossy that it seemed to radiate back light; also dove colored trousers and a white waistcoat; across the latter was draped a good deal of chain which held slides and dangling things known as charms. He was fat; he had a long mustache and "goatee" so visibly dyed as to appear to be ready to soil anything with which his face should come in contact.

He walked up the path to the front door and knocked. Mrs. Whiting had been peeping through the side lights, and she now opened the door with unexpected promptness, so that she received a whiff of smoke directly in her face and was seized with a fit of coughing. The stranger threw his cigar away and took off his hat with a large flourish, which revealed a bald head.

By this time Mr. Whiting had made his way round to the front of his house, and was standing close to the stepstone, filled with curiosity, but determined not to speak first.

"My name is Fickett—Leander Fickett," said the man, as if he were conferring a favor.

Mr. Whiting nodded, and Mrs. Whiting tried desperately to stop coughing that she might hear better.

"I was told," went on the stranger in a way perfectly in keeping with his trousers and his chains and his gloves, "that Mr. Samuel Barnes resided here. Be you him?" looking at Mr. Whiting, who said slowly:

"No, I ain't him, 'n' he don't reside here."

"From that minute," said Mr. Whiting, in relating the incident afterward, "from that minute I knew something was up 'bout that woman."

That woman meaning Mr. Barnes' second wife.

"Can you tell me where Mr. Barnes does reside?" was the next question.

"I can," was the answer. But before giving the information Zenas thought he would ask a question:

"Who be you?"

"I told you—Leander Fickett." The two who heard him say this were trying in vain to recall when they had before heard that name.

"Yes, but who be you?" retorted Mr. Whiting.

"I am," said Mr. Fickett in his large way, "I am Mr. Samuel Barnes' wife's husband."

Mr. Whiting whistled. He looked at his helpmeet, who actually gasped as she returned his glance.

"Can't ye come in?" she inquired in a voice which curiosity made cordial.

Now Leander Fickett was a man who would rather talk about himself than do anything else. He knew he was well worth talking about. His visit at the residence of Mrs. Barnes could wait.

He accepted the invitation, and was soon sitting on the best haircloth chair in the Whiting parlor. The chair creaked, but it bore up. The first thing Mr. Fickett told his companions was that he was worth more than $1,000,000, and that in two years more he should be worth double that sum—all out of the Leading Star mine. He had come back after his wife.

"He guessed them divorce papers didn't amount to much. He guessed he 'n' Mr. Barnes could arrange it. Charlotte always did like to handle money. He'd had some trouble with Charlotte, but he kinder hankered to give her the handlin' of some of that money. He didn't reckon there'd be much difficulty. He considered that he could make it all straight with Mr. Barnes. Folks wasn't so partickler 'bout such things out where he'd ben. He was willin' to do the fair thing, but he guessed he'd take Charlotte back with him; he guessed she'd go."

He was right in his surmises. Charlotte did go.

On this particular day Mr. Barnes was absent until nightfall. When he returned there was only the hired girl in the house. She told him that "Mis' Barnes 'd gone off to ride with a gentleman, 'n' didn't say when she should come back."

She did not come back. The next day Mr. Barnes received a letter signed "Charlotte Fickett." The letter explained that she, the writer, had always felt compunctions about marrying another man while her husband was still living, but that her love for Mr. Barnes had overruled her conscience. Now, however, her conscience had been too much for her and she could go against it no longer. She obeyed the voice of duty, and at the same time the voice of Leander Fickett.

Mr. Barnes turned off his hired girl. He lives alone and does his own housework as well as his farmwork. He looks 70. People say he "ain't so sharp in a bargain 's he used to be," and naturally they think he has "soft'nin' of the brain."

Mrs. Whiting asserts that if 'twas soft'nin' of the heart she would have some hopes of him.—New York Tribune.

Wanted It Made Good.

The fashionable Fledgely had got a new valet, who astonished him the other morning by demanding an increase of wages.

"I must have it, sir, considering what I'll have to put up with, or I won't stay."

"Why, what's happened?"

"Well, sir, I began smoking your cigars today, and if that's your regular brand I want to have it considered in my pay."—Philadelphia Times.

Deer, when caught in a blinding snow storm, huddle together and tramp round and round in a circle, beating down the soft snow, so that when a very heavy fall occurs during say twelve hours they find themselves in a snow pen, with walls above them, and if they commence to tramp on top of several feet of snow during a storm they often find themselves in a corral of snow, with a wall surrounding them to a height of ten or twelve feet when the storm clears off, being virtually imprisoned in a snowy prison pen, from which escape is impossible until the spring thaw of the season.—Marysville Appeal.

Among strange and humiliating customs of the Russians which were abolished by Peter the Great was that of beating the forehead on the ground upon entering the presence of the tsar, and that of public flagellation of defaulting debtors. The former, chelobitie, was Mongolian or Byzantine; the latter, the punishment of the praviosh, was introduced by the Tartars.

We lose two pounds of water in the twenty-four hours by perspiration, and the more we perspire the cooler we become. There are 27,000,000 pores on the surface of our bodies, which if placed in a line would extend twenty-eight miles in length.

A WONDERFUL MACHINE.

There is no doubt that man is a fine mechanism, but like every other machine he wears out by friction. It is said that he is born again every two or three years. His body is virtually re-made from food. To retard this making over is radically wrong, as a man loses so much vitality in the delayed process that it takes a long time to recuperate. The process of making a-new is so accelerated by purging with BRANDRETH'S PILLS that a new man, as it were, may be made in two or three months, and the change in the mechanism is such that the wornout part is replaced by the new without the usual running down of the entire machine. You don't have to stop for repairs. Purge away with BRANDRETH'S PILLS the old, diseased and worn out body. BRANDRETH'S PILLS are purely vegetable, absolutely harmless, and safe to take at any time.

IN THE NICK OF TIME.

The nick of time to stop the course of bladder and kidney complaints is when the organs concerned exhibit a tendency to grow inactive. The healthful impulse toward activity that they receive from Hostetter's Stomach Bitters rescues them from impending danger, and averts such dangerous maladies as Bright's disease and diabetes. Sluggishness of the kidneys increases a liability to chronic rheumatism, gout and dropsy, and since the blood is filtered by these organs in its passage through them, the operation of the Bitters serves a doubly happy purpose. The medicine acts without exciting, like the fiery stimulants of commerce. Malarial, dyspeptic, constipated and nervous invalids are thoroughly relieved by it. Since the advent of that shocking malady, la grippe, it has been widely demonstrating its usefulness as a curative and preventive of it.

Gummy—Do you know, Glanders, that I am a self-made man? Glanders—Sh! I wouldn't tell anybody if I were you.

"There's something behind it." That's what you think, perhaps, when you read that the proprietors of Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy offer $500 reward for an incurable case of Catarrh. Rather unusual, you think, to find the makers of a medicine trying to prove that they believe in it. "There must be something back of it!"

But it's a plain, square offer, made in good faith. The only thing that's back of it is the Remedy. It cures Catarrh in the Head. To its mild, soothing, cleansing and healing properties, the worst cases yield, no matter how bad or of how long standing. It has a record that goes back for 25 years. It doesn't simply relieve—it perfectly and permanently cures. With a Remedy like this, the proprietors can make such an offer and mean it. To be sure there's risk in it, but it's so very small that they are willing to take it.

You've "never heard of anything like this offer?" True enough. But then you've never heard of anything like Dr. Sage's Remedy.

"German Syrup"

William McKeekan, Druggist at Bloomingdale, Mich. "I have had the Asthma badly ever since I came out of the army and though I have been in the drug business for fifteen years, and have tried nearly everything on the market, nothing has given me the slightest relief until a few months ago, when I used Boschee's German Syrup. I am now glad to acknowledge the great good it has done me. I am greatly relieved during the day and at night go to sleep without the least trouble." 6

BAD TASTE in the mouth or an unpleasant breath, when resulting from Catarrh, are overcome, and the nasal passages which have been closed for years are made free by the use of Ely's Cream Balm. I suffered from catarrh for twelve years, experiencing the nauseating dropping in the throat peculiar to that disease, and nose bleed almost daily. I tried various remedies without benefit until last April, when I saw Ely's Cream Balm advertised. I procured a bottle, and since the first day's use have had no more bleeding—the soreness is entirely gone.—D. G. Davidson, with the Boston Budget, formerly with Boston Journal.

FOUGHT BLACK HAWK.

Reunion of Survivors of the Sac and Fox War.

NOTED INDIAN FIGHTERS OF THAT TIME.

There are twenty odd survivors of the Black Hawk war. These ancient veterans have arranged to hold a celebration of the sixtieth anniversary of the battle of Kellogg's Grove at Lena, Stephenson county, Ills., on the 25th of next June, and for many reasons the occasion promises to be one of more than ordinary interest.

The conquest of the Sacs and Foxes will always be memorable, not so much because of savage forays and swift reprisals as because of surrounding circumstances and of the subsequent eminence of several who participated in the campaign. The immediate result of Black Hawk's overthrow was the settlement of the Rock river valley. Towns sprang up where the loghouses of pioneers had heretofore existed, and cities like Rockford and Dixon remain permanent monuments to the genius and daring of such hardy frontiersmen as Germanicus Kent and Thatcher Blake, who viewed the broad panorama of forest and field skirting the banks of the beautiful stream, and viewing resolved to possess.

MONUMENT TO THE SLAIN.

Sixty years! Not a long period, surely, in the history of a race, a nation or the great struggle for an idea, yet it means much to the individual man. It is ample space in which to make a name, to challenge fortune, to grasp and relinquish leadership, and to review from the heights of serene old age the turbulence and triumphs of a vigorous prime.

Sixty years ago Black Hawk was a powerful and dreaded chief, who had approved his courage and skill through many wars. Born near the mouth of Rock river, in 1768, he became a tribal king when twenty years of age. The fair and fertile valley supplied all the simple demands of his followers. They drew fish from the streams that flowed by their island farms. Game was plentiful, and the seasons succeeded each other in harmony disturbed only by collisions with other tribes.

The white men appeared. First a few, then many. They wanted land and they bought from the Sacs and Foxes a large part of what is now northern Illinois and southern Wisconsin. There was a "flaw in the title" and Black Hawk contested. He declined to go to a reservation west of the Mississippi. Afterward he went. Then he returned and trouble followed, brought on, as claimed, by the unwise precipitancy of the settlers. The west was in an uproar. Governor John Reynolds, of Illinois, called for state volunteers and the national government turned out the regulars.

CAPTAIN D. S. HARRIS.

General Winfield Scott conducted one branch of the campaign, and Colonel Zachary Taylor another. Lieutenant Jefferson Davis was actively engaged, and Lieutenant Robert Anderson, acting as assistant inspector general, mustered into the service a lot of "Clary Grove boys" from Schuyler county, including Abraham Lincoln and John T. Stuart. Among others who participated in the brief struggle were Henry Dodge, A. C. Dodge, G. W. Jones and Sydney Breese.

Here indeed was a collection of talent in the wilderness! Two future presidents of the United States, the leader of the southern confederacy and the defender of Fort Sumter; Stuart was to be known as the "silver tongued congressman," and Henry Dodge as Wisconsin's governor and senator; A. C. Dodge and Jones also became senators, and were embassadors of the United States at various foreign courts, while Breese found distinction as a lawyer and rose to the bench of the supreme court of Illinois.

Associated with these people were the venerable and honored few who hope to participate in the reunion at Lena next June. Captain D. S. Harris, of Galena, commanded a company at the battle of Wisconsin Heights; Cyrus Lichtenberger, of Apple River, Ills., fought under Colonel James M. Strode, and W. G. Nevitt, of Albany, Ills., was in the mounted volunteer infantry. They, as well as several others on the list of the survivors, were mere lads when they enlisted to fight what was termed in the extravagant and unfounded language of the hour the "British bought band of savage invaders."

Now they are approaching or have passed the eightieth milestone in the march of life, yet probably none of them regrets old age, for the sixty years between the fight at Kellogg's Grove and the reunion at Lena were well worth living. Think of the notable events occurring between the dates 1832 and 1892—the nullification excitement, the commercial panic and the wiping out of the national debt in 1836; Dorr's rebellion, the war with Mexico, the exploits of Fremont the Pathfinder, the discovery of gold, the oratorical battles of Clay, Webster and Calhoun. After those, John Brown at Harper's Ferry, the civil war, the assassination of Lincoln, the purchase of Alaska, the great Chicago fire, the slaying of Garfield and the subjugation of Black Hawk's ancient foes, the Sioux.

Where these old men fought as lads more than 500 cities, towns and villages now dot the plain, and the Rock no longer flows with stately calm. Her waters are chained to do the service of man, and tumble over dams, shoot through mills and bear the burden of vessels.

As for the Sacs and Foxes, once so dreaded and powerful, they are now little more than a name. The few descendants are of mixed blood and uncertain origin. The nation ceased to be a nation when Black Hawk met defeat and suffered capture.

And, by the way, what a fate was his! He was dragged about and exhibited in eastern cities like a chained eagle, but he displayed the serenity of a stoic, the cheerfulness of a philosopher and the curiosity of a child. The achievements of the paleface astounded him, and like many a public man of the present day he got into a dispute with the newspapers, which he termed "the village criers." Here is a "correction," for which the old warrior secured a place in print:

"I must contradict the story of some village criers, who, I have been told, accuse me of 'having murdered women and children among the whites!' This assertion is false! I never did, nor have I any knowledge that any of my nation ever killed a white woman or child. I make this statement of truth to satisfy the white people among whom I have been traveling (and by whom I have been treated with great kindness), that, when they shook me by the hand so cordially, they did not shake the hand that had ever been raised against any but warriors.

"The white man has proved himself more powerful than I in war. I have accepted my present situation. The Great Spirit has ruled that it should be so, and for wise ends, to be unfolded in time, but now known only to him. We are all, red or white, his children, and cannot see with his eyes. I feel that I have now but little time to remain on the earth. In a few more moons I shall be gathered to my fathers, but I trust that some day the more thoughtful of the white men may learn that the Indian, like the white man, was neither entirely bad nor entirely good."

CYRUS LICHTENBERGER.

They shut the chief up in Fortress Monroe for awhile, and then allowed him to return to his tribe. He died at a village on the Des Moines river Oct. 3, 1838, and was buried in Davis county. A doctor stole the corpse and took it to Quincy, Ills., where the bones were cleaned and varnished ready for wiring. The governor of Iowa secured the return of the skeleton, and Black Hawk's widow made him a present of it. A physician became the next owner, and finally the battered remnants of the great chief were again consigned to earth, this time in the potter's field of the Aspen (Ia.) cemetery.

To the citizens of the mining district embracing the county of Jo Daviess, in the state of Illinois and the western part of the territory of Michigan on the upper Mississippi—Inhabiting as we do a country isolated from our brethren both of the state and of the Union to which we belong, surrounded by a savage and hostile enemy, who has raised both the tomahawk and scalping knife alike on the defenseless inhabitants and the soldier going forth to battle, already have we witnessed the fall of a Durley, a St. Vrain, a Halle, a Fowler and a Hawley on this side of Rock river, while the scalping knife is still reeking in the blood of our fellow citizens between Rock river and Peoria, and two sisters (Sylvia and Rachel Hall) are groaning in captivity among a savage enemy. * * * We are prevented by Indian hostility from cultivating our farms and gardens, receiving but little succor from the state or from the general government, receiving but scanty supplies by way of the Mississippi, which must every day become more precarious.

Sylvia and Rachel Hall are spoken of as "groaning in captivity." Black Hawk asserted that he and his people never raised hand "against any but warriors," and, so far as the Hall girls are concerned, he told the truth. They regained their liberty and returned to their friends absolutely unharmed, and one of them, Rachel, now a resident of Texas, hopes to be present at next June's reunion.

W. G. NEVITT.

All in all Black Hawk must be regarded as a magnificent but necessary sacrifice to the relentless juggernaut of the white man's progress. FRED C. DAYTON.

Work and Long Life.

Thoughtful medical men are now contending that it is not advisable for a person to drop all work with advancing years, as both mind and body are like pieces of machinery, which wear out more rapidly from the rust of disuse than from ordinary work. The fact, which seems to make a good argument, is pointed out that those of the public men who have remained in harness have retained their mental faculties unimpaired to the end. The theory is perhaps a novel one, but it would appear to demand consideration.

DIMPLE AND DUMPLING.

Sad Fate of Two Cherished Little Curls.

CUT OFF BY A HARD HEARTED BARBER.

The Secret History of One Family Revealed During the Operation.

There was only one chair vacant in a downtown barber shop the other day when a tall young man, accompanied by a lady and a lovely little girl of 5, entered, and calling the head barber to one side gave him a few explicit directions. Then the little girl's hat was removed and the barber enveloped her in one of the big white aprons. The young man lifted her up into the barber's chair with a whispered word of reassurance, and the lady, after kissing her, passed her hands caressingly over all the beautiful golden brown curls. Then she sat down in a corner where the child could not see her face and pulled out her pockethandkerchief.

By this time the occupants of the five other chairs had become vastly interested. All eyes were fixed on the sweet baby face with its curly halo. It was a pale little face, and there were no rosebuds on its cheeks, but above them were two glorious gray eyes that shone like a pair of stars. On each side of the little face rested a particularly fat curl. The child placed her hand upon each as the barber advanced with the big shears, and gazed beseechingly up into his face.

"Now, Mr. Barber, I want you to leave Dimple and Dumpling until the very last—cut all the rest of them off first, please. I shall miss them dreffully, you know; me and Dimple and Dumpling has always been such friends. Dimple is going out to my papa in a letter. My papa is 'way out in Ceylon, you know. You haven't got a papa 'way out in Ceylon, Mr. Barber?"

"No, miss, I ain't got none at all."

FAMILY SECRETS COME OUT.

"And haven't you got no mamma, Mr. Barber? My mamma is going to put Dumpling into her 'Don't You Remember' box. Did you ever see a 'Don't You Remember' box, Mr. Barber?"

"No, miss, I never did."

"Mamma's has got such a funny lot of things in it. There's a little bit of orange blossom, and a little pinafore that Alec used to wear. That's Alec over there at the window. And there's a little red shoe that was our little bruffer's. His name was Robin, and he died before any of us was borned, you know."

At this moment the mother stepped forward and whispered to the little girl. There was an old gentleman with a very red face in one of the chairs who shook like a veritable jelly at the child's remark. Big brother Alec was blushing furiously, and the whole barber shop was all agog.

There was silence for a moment or two while the scissors went snip, snip, snip. Then the little prattler broke forth again.

"Mamma says I'm talking too much, Mr. Barber; but if I don't talk I shall begin to cry. I cried awfully yesterday, you know; so did mamma and nurse. That was when the doctor came and said they'd have to be cutted off. We all cried—'cept Cecil. He's 8. He never cries—'cepting when mamma spanks him. Then he howls. But at last I stopped crying, for Alec said he'd take me to lunch with him when we came in to have it done; nurse said she'd let me sit up till half past 7 for a whole week; mamma's going to get me a silver thimble, and cook is going to have waffles for tea when we get back. Do you like waffles, Mr. Barber?

The barber replied in the affirmative, and then there was silence for a little while.

"Have you got a sweetheart, Mr. Barber?" A titter ran around the room, and the barber turned as red as his pole outside, but he replied in the negative.

"Alec's got one," pursued the child. "He goes to tea with her on Sunday. Cecil says he's awfully sweet on her. Cecil knows, too; he was under the sofa when"—

But Alec waited to hear no further. He bolted bodily and waited on the corner until the ordeal was at an end. The lady arose and whispered some further cautions, but they proved of no avail.

A TICKET TO THE BASEBALL GAME.

"Now, miss, just please sit steady a minute."

The scissors gave a snip, and poor Dumpling fell down into her lap. Dimple followed an instant later, and the child gazed ruefully at the two beautiful severed curls.

"Good-by, Dumpling and Dimple," she said, and the tears began to gather.

"Thank you very much, Mr. Barber," said the little child, holding her hand out. "When me and Cecil get whiskers we'll come to you to cut them off. Do you play baseball, Mr. Barber? Cos if you do I'm going to give you a present. Would you like a ticket for our baseball match, Mr. Barber?"

She pulled out a little bit of pasteboard from her pocket and handed it to him:

GRAND BASEBALL MATCH.

DICK TURPINS VS.
TUSCAROKAHS.
Admission, 3 Pins.

"Cecil is captain of the Dick Turpins, and he said now that I was going to have my hair cut off I'd be just as good as a boy. So he's going to lend me a pair of his trousers and I'm to be second base."

At the doorway the red faced old gentleman accosted them. He had his hat on by this time, but he took it off immediately and made a most courteous bow.

"Madam," he exclaimed, "there are two things I want particularly, and you can grant me both of them. I want a kiss from that little daughter of yours and a ticket for that baseball match. I can't pay the price of admission, for I haven't three pins to my name, but perhaps this," and as he spoke he slipped something bright and shiny into Lena's hand, "to be devoted to soda water after the Tuscaroras have been completely done up, might answer the purpose just as well."

The lady smiled and allowed Lena to give him the desired kiss, but she handed him back the money and could not be prevailed upon to accept it. Then, with a parting nod to the barber, the two joined Alec on the corner. When last seen Lena was lifted up to the letter box to dispatch Dimple on the first stage of his long journey, and the red faced gentleman, as he lost sight of her in the crowd on Broadway, vowed fervently that he would see that game of baseball even if it cost a leg.—Chicago Herald.

SOMETHING NEW FOR FISHERMEN.

A Contrivance to Beguile the Reluctant Minnow Into Acting as Bait.

Many a time what promised to be a fine day's fishing has been spoiled by a long and tedious hunt for the proper kind of bait with which to angle. A pair of bootheels sticking up through the grass by the side of a brook and one long rumbling growl of profanity issuing seemingly from under the earth are familiar indications to a large number of people who have "been there" themselves that some ardent and irritable fisherman is lying there on his face trying to keep out of sight of the timid minnows he wants to scoop up out of the stream at one dash and then be off. But the little minnows are in no hurry.

They dart away at the sight of his unfamiliar scoop net, and lie under the farther bank, wriggling their little tails tantalizingly. Now the fisherman wishes he had taken time by the forelock and secured his bait on the day before he was to start on his expedition. He reviles his procrastination as the minutes slip by and the hot sun beats on his back, and he resolves never to do it again. But this does not mollify the minnows in the least, and the scene generally ends by the angler going off furious with only a few miserable little fellows in his can.

An ingenious inventor has come to the relief of fishermen lately by producing a minnow trap that is hard to beat. First of all it is wholly composed of transparent, colorless glass, and is in shape much like a big cartridge with a pointed bullet in it. It is about two and one-half feet long, and as big around as a man's leg above the knee. It is hollow, of course, and what would be the flat end of the cartridge is punched in, like the bottom of a glass bottle, and there is a small round hole in the apex of the cone thus made. The other and the pointed end of the trap is fitted with a little sliding door.

This big glass cartridge is intended to be set on its side in the bottom of a brook where minnows abound. The cautious ones soon become accustomed to it, and the reckless fellows don't see it till they bump their noses against it. Some nice bait is put inside the trap, and the minnows soon find their way into it through the whole in the punched in end. The little door at the other end is shut, of course.

The minnows are unable to find their way out, because they follow the sides of the trap, and this leads them into the cul de sac at the flat end, all around the bottom of the cone. They are easily poured out, however, with the water in the trap, by holding the thing up pointed end down and opening the little slide door. Wire is twisted around the outside of the trap, and forms a handle by which it is conveniently carried, and the wire also protects the glass from injury.—New York Tribune.

He Was Out Late.

A good story is told of an east end policeman.

He observed somebody climbing in the side window of a prominent citizen's house after midnight and promptly seized the intruder.

He proved to be a 14-year-old boy.

"What are you doing here?" demanded the policeman.

"I live here," declared the youth.

"I don't know about that. We'll see. Come around to the front door."

After a few pressures of the electric button a masculine head was protruded from an upper window, and it was saluted by this query from the youth:

"Pap, ain't I your boy?"

"It sounds like his voice," replied the father; "what's the matter?"

"I found him getting in the window, sir," replied the officer, "and I didn't recognize him. So I brought him to the front to see if he was your son."

"Quite right, officer; quite right! Now, young man, come in and we'll investigate the reason of your being out so late."

The two adjourned to the kitchen, and——

But we will draw a veil over what followed. — Pittsburg Chronicle-Telegraph.

Why People Like Football.

Dr. White says that people like football so much because, among other reasons, the young men who play the game display a soldier like courage, and who does not admire bravery? A case in illustration might be quoted of a man on a football eleven of one of the big colleges in an exciting year. It was in a championship game that he went smashing down the field and came full force into an opponent. No one ever knew quite how it happened, but the runner dropped like a log. His chest was battered in and his sternum was broken—and they thought that he was dead. When four men were carrying him off the field he opened his eyes for a moment. His face was deathly white and his lips were blue. "Say, boys," he gasped, "give them the devil for this." Then he fainted again, and staid in the hospital for many weeks. —New York Tribune.

HISTORY OF DOLLS.

How They Keep Pace With Civilization's Progress.

USED AS PORTRAYERS OF FASHIONS.

Only those who have been through it all for themselves can understand the broad, deep place that the doll holds in the baby's heart, and how the childish imagination beautifies it, or reproduces by its means all the pleasures and sorrows of infantile existence. George Eliot appreciated this last feeling when she made poor little Maggie Tulliver find the outlet for her rages by driving nails into a hairless wooden skull.

Then, too, the doll is significant, not only for its wide and curious history, but because in the great progress of civilization it has kept pace with more serious things, until today its evolution is an event to be proud of. Not that it has ever been treated lightly as a thing of no account. On the contrary, Tacitus in his time told the Germans that far back in gray intiquity their ancestors were in the habit of burying with the dead the objects dearest to them, and subsequent excavations made at Nuremburg during the last century have brought to light a variable doll's house and various clay figures, proved to be the playthings of the little ancient Germans, whose failings and feelings were not, after all, very different from those of the present small American.

It was about 800 A. D. that the importance of the doll was fully demonstrated by a rigorous and orthodox persecution carried on against it in the church. To play with one was strictly forbidden, since, as "children of the devil," they were destructive to the soul, and all those ancient customs in which they had any part—such as the sacrificing of a doll to Venus on the morning of marriage to indicate that the bride had put away childish things—were likewise strictly prohibited.

But even this heroic treatment failed to accomplish its object or stifle the progressive instinct in the disgraced ones, for when art and wealth began to center in the French capital, those dollies of aristocratic pretentions abandoned their more plebeian companions, promptly migrated from Germany and in due course became thorough Parisians from the top of their fuzzy perukes to the pointed toes of their tiny slippers. And then it was that the really serious destiny of the doll began. In the absence of fashion journals, and limited by difficulties in transportation, the French modiste turned in his despair to this little lay figure.

Gowned in the most ravishing costume then a la mode, he sent her out into the distant provinces to excite imitation and inculcate extravagance in all womankind. As an outcome of this, the most luxurious dames had models made after their own measurements and sent to town to be fitted; and in this way the French doll came to take precedence over all other dolls, and to mean even now a thing of beauty and a word of power.

From a graver point of view, a German writer has suggested that the doll may have a real psychical importance. He advances the theory that by the way a child handles, caresses, cares for or neglects it, a correct idea may be gathered of the growth of character, and in corroboration of this he calls attention to the fact that the doll is most popular in those countries where the domestic and maternal instinct is the strongest.—Boston Transcript.

Power of Chinese Trades Unions.

The trades unions of the Chinese are the most remarkable in the world, and they bind the members of the different professions and trades to one another with hooks of steel. These unions are a powerful element, for their political influence is greater than that of any of the trades unions of the United States. The tea merchants have a guild. The bankers have a guild. Even the fellows who push the wheelbarrow cabs have a guild. There are something like 400 banks in Pekin. There are 300 in Tien-Tsin, and a large number in each of the Chinese cities. Suppose the bankers running these establishments decide not to lend any money to certain classes or to the government and you can see their influence. They can control the financial policy of the empire. They fix the rates of interest and regulate exchange.—Frank G. Carpenter in National Tribune.

Desirable Points in a Carrier Pigeon.

The points to be desired in a messenger pigeon are brainy heads—that is, broad between the eyes and full at the back—bright, intelligent eyes, and wings that show length, breadth and firmness of pinion webs, together with a straight alignment of the wing feather tips when fully expanded.—Denver Republican.

The Area of the World.

The total area of the habitable world is computed at about 52,000,000 square miles, of which 32,000,000 of square miles are subject to nominally Christian nations and 20,000,000 subject to non-Christian nations.—Exchange.

The alcohol process of obtaining sugar from cane sirup has revolutionized sugar making from that source. The process is very simple, and it is said that but 1 per cent. of the alcohol used is lost.

THEY CLEANED HIS HEART.

The Daring Experiment of French Physicians and Its Fatal Result.

American surgeons have the credit of being among the most daring in their experiments, but they do not beat the French. What do you think of an attempt to clean a man's heart? This is what was attempted a short while since here in France. This is a true story I am telling you, no invention. Two surgeons actually set to work to cut open a man's chest for the purpose of getting at and cleaning his heart.

Joseph Davenne, an upholsterer, had been suffering for many years from fatty degeneration of the heart. The poor man knew that he had not long to live, yet he was only 48 years of age, and saw no reason why he should die. Moreover, the doctors told him they thought they might possibly cure him. They persuaded him that at least he would be doing invaluable service to science, and that he was bound to die soon at any rate if nothing was done, whereas this might prove the means of curing thousands of sufferers beside himself.

"And so," the story is gravely told in a French medical journal from which I translate, "poor M. Davenne consented to place himself under their hands."

Then comes a lot of technical description of the operation, which was performed under water while the patient was in a condition of anæsthesia. I won't give all these scientific words; it is quite unnecessary to tell in scientific language how the cuticle was removed, the pectoral muscles carefully dissected from the ribs, the cartilaginous junctions of the ribs and sternum disconnected and the heaving lungs in their delicate, shining, covering membranes exposed to view.

Up to this point the patient still lived!

The heart, however, had not yet been reached. But to the two French surgeons this was a mere detail which their knives would speedily overcome. They did overcome this mere detail very rapidly. In less than a minute more one of them had M. Davenne's heart in his hand, and was busily engaged scraping from its surface the adipose deposit with which it was covered and which so impeded its proper action.

And so he was—dead as the door nail which Dickens has made proverbial.

How they could have expected anything else is not recorded. They had, however, taken the precaution to have M. Davenne sign, seal and deliver a paper to the effect that the operation was performed entirely at his own risk, and that no person but himself was to be held in any way whatever responsible for his death, should it occur.—Paris Cor. New York World.

A Street Car Episode.

I was coming up town in a street car recently when there entered, evidently from one of the neighboring railroad ferries, an old gentleman dressed rather carelessly in an old fashioned way, who had a good sized sachel in his hand. He sat down and rested the sachel on his knees. The conductor, who rejoiced in a bull neck and a square jaw very much in need of the razor, came in for his fare and said, curtly:

"Put that gripsack on the floor."

"I prefer to carry it this way," replied the old gentleman calmly, for which nobody blamed him, as the floor of the car was carpeted with mud.

"Are you goin' to put it down, say?" demanded the conductor, with a scowl.

"No," replied the old gentleman, looking him squarely in the eyes.

The scoundrel went to the rear platform muttering curses on what he denominated "the old jay." "The old jay" was one of the most distinguished lawyers in the country, an ex-governor of a great state and a scholar of universal renown.—New York Cor. Pittsburg Bulletin.

What Trained Senses Can Do.

The talk drifted to the education of the senses to a higher degree than common, and one man said: "It is remarkable how well a perfumer learns to recognize a scent. In testing a sweet smelling liquid he wets the base of his left thumb with a little of it. Then he rubs the place rapidly with his right hand. The alcohol in which the essence is dissolved, being the more volatile, is at once evaporated, and the substance which emits the odor remaining behind he can smell in it its purity.

"Of course it is an easy thing to recognize the principal odors that are in use, but when several are mixed, as is common, his task becomes more difficult. Yet a skilled man cannot only tell you what three or four perfumes enter into the composition of the one he is testing, but also, roughly, the relative proportions of each."—New York Tribune.

MEN WHO SUPPLY FAKIRS.

They are Willing to Buy Anything That is Cheap.

THE REMAINS OF COMMERCIAL WRECKS.

A Business in Which "Quick Sales and Small Profits" are the Rule.

There are three or four men in this city who, if they can buy cheap enough, will take up any sized stock of goods and pay cash for it. These are the men who supply the street fakirs with the articles which seem to fairly break out on the street like some queer disease. One day you will see thousands of Japanese teapots or Malacca canes, while the next an amazing number of shoe brushes form the attraction. The rule of this business is that nothing can be easily sold on the street which costs more than ten cents, although, of course, this, like other rules, has its exceptions. Of this ten cents the peddlers must make at least four. It matters little to the men who buy the bankrupt stocks, then, what the articles may be, provided on their purchase they can make a profit, selling at seven cents.

There is, however, one point which must be borne in mind. The articles, whatever they may be, must be really good of their kind, for the whole theory of the business is dealing in real bargains. The purchasers are generally shrewd buyers, not only knowing when the things offered are good, but as a rule buying them, not because they are wanted, but because they are cheap, and the number of bargains which may be secured from these men by any one who will watch for them is amazing. I remember buying a Malacca cane for ten cents many years ago which did good service.

In a city where as many business failures take place as are chronicled in New York the existence of men who can dispose of any stock and get rid of it is a prime necessity. The houses which place their wares through the street peddlers have the command of large capital, and do business on the "quick sales and small profits" principle. They rarely carry a stock, unless it be very large, over three or four days, for in that time the push cart men, if the articles go at all, will clean them out. They are always on the loookout for bankruptcies, forced sales and the like, and their stores are curiosity shops, littered up with the flotsam and jetsam which have remained over from many commercial wrecks. But they deal in toys, fruit, vegetables, game—anything that is cheap and can go quickly. "The Pigs in the Pen," which sent the city wild, were placed by them, and it is not uncommon to see editions of books forced into circulation through their offices.

As may be imagined the men in this business must not alone possess a widespread knowledge of goods, but they must have a keen appreciation of the public taste and know exactly what will take. It has been believed that pawnbrokers know more of the values of diverse articles than any other men in a city like New York, but it is a question whether those who deal through peddlers are not the equal of "Our Uncles" in this. Anyway, theirs is a business which can only be made to pay while this species of sagacity is displayed, for should they make a mistake it is tolerably certain the fakirs will not and that the stock will then be left unsold.

The ability of the average fakir to determine beforehand whether a given line of articles will take savors of the supernatural. I am told that a successful man in this business will not only determine instantly whether he wants to push a sale, but that in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred he will be absolutely right. If the jobber makes a mistake his only chance of saving himself is to get the men to take out the goods on speculation; in other words, on credit. As the business all through is or should be cash, this policy is not looked upon with much favor.

The need of judgment on the part of the jobber is, however, most felt when he is selling to the peddlers. The amount of profit allowed to them is in inverse ratio to the rapidity with which they can sell, and it is therefore to their interest to make the jobber believe he has a "slow lot" on hand. Their volubility in crying the excellence of their wares on the street is as nothing to that which expresses their contempt for the goods when they are themselves asked to buy. The jobber then must know just how the things will go or he will find himself left with a profit which shall make him mourn.

It is a curious business which has grown out of the failures of commercial life, but it is not without its interesting points.—New York Telegram.

The Origin of a Famous Tree.

In the famous West Philadelphia Bartram Botanical gardens there flourishes an enormous Florida swamp cedar, the trunk of which is fully six feet in diameter. This tree was planted under very peculiar circumstances, well worthy of narration. One day, many years ago, the great Bartram was riding through the state of marshes and alligators, and the beast he bestrode was a very Rocinante. So, to accelerate his journey, he dismounted at a neighboring swamp and cut a switch, with which he belabored to good effect the lean and hungry steed. The switch did such good service upon this occasion that he preserved it, and upon his return to Philadelphia planted it in his garden, and the huge swamp cedar is the switch.—Philadelphia Record.

There came a time in England when so much of the wealth and property of the nation had passed into the possession of a class that the great bulk of the people were utterly beggared. There was scarcely enough left to provide for the defense of the kingdom and defray the necessary expenses of government. Having got hold of this wealth, the possessors refused to pay any taxes. They demanded that the people who had earned it should pay for the protection of it in other hands. The sacredness of vested rights were urged, and as the Courts were presided over by the creatures of the wealthy class, judgment was given in their favor. At length the evil became unendurable, and by one wide sweep all that vast wealth was restored to the use of the Nation. Englishmen set us the example of resistance to tyranny that was so gloriously followed in 1776. Conditions are rapidly growing that may make it necessary for us to go back to a still earlier example of English methods of dealing with evil, and by a just exercise of the power of the people restore to public use the enormous wealth filched from us by men with the greed of the grave. It cannot be that the most industrious and ingenious people that ever lived on earth will go on to produce wealth never before dreamed of, and be content to toil incessantly with no more gain from their labor and ingenuity than a bare subsistence. The vast property held by a few millionaires now is no more sacred than the wealth that was confiscated in England three hundred and fifty years ago. England has set the whole world many noble examples and this is not the least.

The produce of a fairly well managed farm of one hundred and sixty acres of land anywhere in the United States ought to support the owner and his family in comfort, and even luxury, and that too without constant drudgery for the owner. But no class pass lives of such ceaseless toil as farmers. The wives and even little children for a great part of each year rarely enjoy one hour of rest any day while there is light enough to labor. Yet with all this work farmers at the end of the year find they are barely able to make ends meet. Interest on mortgages, taxes, excessive freight rates on railroads, enormous tariff duties—all these take so much of the product of the toil of the farmer and his family as to leave them barely enough to keep soul and body together. This will continue so long as capitalists and corporations can control the whole machinery of government and have their tools for law makers, judges, executive officers and to occupy every office at the control of the Executive.

The great moneyed power of the country decreed that Harrison should be nominated, and it was done. The system under which a few men can acquire millions of dollars in less time than a settler in a new country can clear and get under cultivation his homestead must be continued. As fast as the settlers make the wilderness fruitful the produce of their toil goes to capitalists and railroad managers. The same power that keeps farmers toiling like bondslaves ruled the convention that nominated Harrison. When the vast system of plunder presented by McKinley was shown to Blaine he denounced it in the bitterest terms, and called it by its true name, a system of wholesale robbery. As quickly as possible he formulated his plan of reciprocity as a partial remedy and did all in his power to mitigate the evils of McKinleyism. For this his position in the cabinet was made so unpleasant that he was forced to resign at last. The power of money ruled the Minneapolis convention.

There is a warning truth as well as a touch of pathos in the reply of General Barnes when asked to make a speech at a whoop-up meeting to celebrate the renomination of Harrison. "See these gray hairs," he said, "they have come by twenty-five years service to the Republican party, and what have I got for it?" It is men of talent who win success for parties, but it is tricky and dishonest schemers who secure all the fruits of that success. Henry Clay held the first place in the hearts of his countrymen, but the money interest and its tools, the wire pullers, were agains him, and the satisfaction of being right was his only reward for all his labor. The fate of Blaine is a repetition of that of Clay. In a smaller way General Barnes has a like experience. Conventions, from county up to State and National, are packed by men who get rich or make easy livings from public plunder.

The Season of Mushrooms.

That delicious fungus growth scientifically called by a big and strange name, but commonly known as the mushroom, is just beginning to come plentifully into the local markets, and they are prepared to stay till late into the fall.

Those which are found in the vegetable stalls in Washington market are of artificial culture and are now selling at about seventy-five cents a pound. A month ago they brought $1.35 a pound, and a month hence fifty cents or even less will buy a goodly supply of the nutritious and delicious white stemmed and brown topped fungi.

Said the ruddy faced and white aproned marketman to me today between the puffs of his perfecto:

"Yes, I sell a good many mushrooms, especially during Lent. Those that come in now are raised in hothouses in beds underneath the plant shelves and they come pretty high, although they are getting down in price lately. I have sold them as high as three dollars a pound. Later on in the spring we get them from the farmers and others who raise them in their cellars, in shaded places and even in caves, and during warm weather men and women and boys and girls who gather them in fields and pastures bring them in to the city. Then we sell them for almost nothing—as low as ten cents a pound sometimes. Most of our customers who buy mushrooms are people of means, and although we sell great quantities of them, the people as a whole don't seem to appreciate and understand them, as I should think they would."

The jolly marketman is right, for mushrooms are not appreciated as they should be. Many people have eaten mushrooms only when the canned article has been served sprinkled sparingly over a steak. There is a vast difference between the canned mushroom and the crisp, fresh and appetizing fungus that one can now buy in any of the large markets.—New York Telegram.

Vegetable Hedgehogs.

Cactuses are the hedgehogs of the vegetable world; their motto is "Nemo me impune lacessit." Many a time in the West Indies I have pushed my hand for a second into a bit of tangled bush, as the negroes call it, to seize some rare flower or some beautiful insect and been punished for twenty-four hours afterward by the stings of the almost invisible and glasslike little cactus needles. The reason for this bellicose disposition on the part of the cactuses is a tolerably easy one to guess. Fodder is rare in the desert. The starving herbivores that find themselves from time to time belated on the confines of such thirsty regions would seize with avidity upon any succulent plant which offered them food and drink at once in their last extremity.

In the ceaseless war between herbivore and plant, which is waged every day and all day long the whole world over with far greater persistence than the war between carnivore and prey, only those species of plant can survive in such exposed situations which happen to develop spines, thorns or prickles as a means of defense against the mouths of hungry and desperate assailants.—Grant Allen in Macmillan's Magazine.

The Father of Modern Jurisprudence.

Louis IX was practically the founder of modern jurisprudence. About the year 1241 he noticed the abuses which were caused in France by men taking into their own hands the work of redressing their own wrongs, and published a proclamation establishing the quarantine du roi. This forbade private redress for wrongs for the space of forty days after the injury was committed. During that time the injured person must seek redress and satisfaction in the king's court, and if his wrong were not righted at the end of forty days he might then take its rectification into his own hands.

This proclamation made justice speedy and tolerably sure, although of course its administration was in a rough and ready way, and unless the records are at fault some law of this kind prevailed in Louisiana at the time when Missouri was a part of the French king's possessions.—Philadelphia Ledger.

MARRIED.

Adolph Gerkins of Laws spent several days in town this week.

Under Sheriff Holland has been out for over a week looking for Frank Raveda.

Big Pine against the world! If you don't think so, take in the Fourth there.

Haying will begin in this vicinity next Monday. The crop will be an average one.

Mrs. F. Rhine accompanied by her daughters started for San Francisco last Tuesday.

Kinsley and Mead's big train went north early in the week loaded with about nine tons of freight.

W. R. Johnson left Keeler early in the week for the southern country. He expects to locate at Bakersfield.

Last evening a traveling company gave a very good variety performance at Independence followed by a social dance.

Owing to the order for marble to be used in the Mills Building being completed the force at the quarry has been reduced.

P. W. Forbes went to Keeler on Wednesday to conduct the preliminary examination of John Morton on behalf of the people. P. H. Mack went down to look after the defendant's interests.

The is a proposition on foot to buy the necessary land and construct a kite-shaped track at Independence. The projectors propose to incorporate a stock company, and the plan seems a very feasible one.

Mr. W. H. Uhlmeyer of Big Pine has been appointed Supervisor of the Third District of Inyo county, vice James B. Steward, deceased, by Governor Markham. His commission bears date of June 7, 1892. —Index.

At the preliminary examination of John Morton at Keeler yesterday the defendant was held for $1,000 bail to appear for trial in the Superior Court. The crime charged is an assault committed upon a Chinaman. He gave the required bail.

Dr. Meade will be found at the residence of Walter James, Sr., where he has opened a dental office. As he expects to remain but a few days all persons desiring his services should call without delay. He will visit Lone Pine next week.

P. W. Forbes publishes his announcement this week as a candidate for the nomination for District Attorney, subject to the action of the Democratic Convention. Mr. Forbes has been practicing law in Inyo county for many years, and has served several terms as District Attorney. He has on every occasion proved an able and conscientious officer and keenly alive to the interests of the people.

In the candidates' column will be found the announcement of S. G. Sneden for District attorney. Mr. Sneden is a pioneer settler of Inyo county. During all that time he has taken an active part in politics and has been a staunch Republican. He is engaged in active practice as an attorney, and his claims should meet with due consideration at the hands of his party.

Will Visit Big Pine.

Owing to the fact that Big Pine will give a Fourth of July celebration, the N. S. G. W. have concluded not to give a ball at Independence on the evening of the Fourth. The Big Pine people have always been good patrons of entertainments of every kind at Independence and Independence will take this occasion to reciprocate the good feeling. The Native Sons will devote their time to the preparation of two dramas to be given Fair Week.

Chamberlain's Colic, Cholera and Diarrhœa Remedy is the standard. Its many cures have won it praise from Maine to California. Every family and every traveler should be provided with it at all times. No other remedy can take its place or do its work. 25 and 50 cent bottles for sale by Another Murder.

At about five o'clock on Monday morning last an Indian arrived here with the news to Sheriff Cody, that Thomas Leahy, foreman of the Evans ranch, better known as the Tom Williams ranch, at Mono Lake in this county, had been murdered by a Mexican named Frank Raveda, who had been employed on the ranch, but lately discharged by Leahy. Sheriff Cody and Deputy Sheriff Crowell started for the scene of the murder, which is about twenty-five miles from Bridgeport. As near as we can learn the following are the particulars of the murder: Leahy and John Saxenhiemer who was to work on the ranch, were on their way to hunt a pasture for a band of horses belonging to the latter. They were about 8 miles from the ranch and between Grant and Silver Lakes when a report of a gun was heard, and Leahy put his hand to his breast and said, "I am shot," and fell dead from his horse. The Mexican was seen by Saxhiemer in the sagebrush, but he at once made tracks for the mountains on the best saddle horse in the county called the Jesse James mare, and was probably in Fresno county, or further south, when the officers reached the ranch. Sheriff Cody has sent telegrams out, but the Mexican will soon be among his own class, who will assist in his escape. Justice Mattly held an inquest and the remains of Mr. Leahy were shipped to reno, Nev., for interment. He leaves a widow, daughter of A. M. Lamb of Reno and two young children to mourn the sudden taking off of a husband and father by the hand of a cowardly assassin. The Mexican had previously been discharged by C. Summers of Long Valley, and it was thought by some that perhaps he would also kill Summers. Had he been caught it is not likely Mono county would have been put to any expense for his trial.—Chronicle Union.

Lone Pine News.

Lone Pine is a lively place just now. A murderer running around loose and three or four squabbles on hand make things highly edifying—to the onlookers at any rate.

R. C. Spear was so unfortunate last week as to have his fine stallion "Flash" break one of his legs.

Rev. J. Smith of Camp Independence delivered a sermon here on Sunday evening in place of Rev. Mr. Winsor.

Mrs. Scott gave a pic-nic for the Sunday School scholars on Wednesday.

On Monday evening there was what would be called in the East a "show" held in Carrasco's Hall. The performance was repeated Wednesday evening.

A Sad Occurrence.

Word was received at Indepence on Wednesday that a serious affair had occurred at Laws last Saturday. The information obtained is very meager, but as near as can be ascertained is as follows: An old man named George Reynolds had corralled some cattle belonging to Bart. McGee. The latter went after them and found Reynolds on guard with a shot gun. Reynolds shot at McGee, missing him, and McGee grabbed a fence rail and struck Reynolds over the head, causing such injuries that he died two days later. They are both old timers in the Valley, and the affair is deeply to be regretted.

Big Pine will Celebrate.

The citizens of Big Pine propose giving a celebration on the Fourth of July. A public meeting was held on Sunday and committees were appointed to attend to the affair. The exercises will be held in Uhlemeyer's grove and will be followed by a pic-nic. A platform will be erected for dancing. A cordial welcome is extended to all and the Big Piners will prove generous and hospitable hosts. Independence will be well represented.

Isn't it about time that a speed programme was prepared for the coming Fair? It takes quite a while to get horses in fix especially for colt races.

In a recent letter to the proprietors, Mr. H. M. Bangs, the druggist at Chatsworth, Ill., says: "I am very much pleased with Chamberlain's Cough Remedy. During the epidemic of la grippe here it took the lead and was very much better liked than other cough medicines." The grip requires precisely the same treatment as a very severe cold, for which this remedy is so efficient. It will promptly loosen a cold and relieve the lungs, soon effecting a cure, while most other medicines in common use for colds only give temporary relief; 50 cent bottles for sale by

IN THE NICK OF TIME.

The nick of time to stop the course of bladder and kidney complaints is when the organs concerned exhibit a tendency to grow inactive. The healthful impulse toward activity that they receive from Hostetter's Stomach Bitters rescues them from impending danger, and averts such dangerous maladies as Bright's disease and diabetes. Sluggishness of the kidneys increases a liability to chronic rheumatism, gout and dropsy, and since the blood is filtered by these organs in its passage through them, the operation of the Bitters serves a doubly happy purpose. The medicine acts without exciting, like the fiery stimulants of commerce. Malarial, dyspeptic, constipated and nervous invalids are thoroughly relieved by it. Since the advent of that shocking malady, la grippe, it has been widely demonstrating its usefulness as a curative and preventive of it.

A little weed has no more right to be in the garden than a big one.

NERVOUS DYSPEPSIA.

Senator James F. Pierce, of New York, writes:

"For the past two years I have suffered very much from an aggravated form of nervous dyspepsia. I have resorted to various remedial agents, deriving but little benefit. A few months since a friend of mind suggested the trial of ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS. Following the suggestion, I have been using the same with the happiest effects. To those similarly afflicted let me suggest the manner of their use. I place one over my stomach, one over the hepatic region, and one on my back. The effect was excellent, and from the day I commenced their use I have been slowly but surely improving, and I am quite confident that by their continuance, with careful regimen, I shall again be restored to my accustomed health."

DEAFNESS CAN'T BE CURED

by local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube gets inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed Deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

We will give One Hundred Dollars for any case of Deafness (caused by Catarrh) that we can not cure by taking Hall's Catarrh Cure. Send for circulars, free.

BUILDING.

Souls are built as temples are—
Sunken deep, unseen, unknown,
Lies the sure foundation stone.
Then the courses framed to bear
Lift the cloisters pillared fair,
Last of all the airy spire,
Soaring heavenward higher and higher,
Nearest sun and nearest star.

Souls are built as temples are—
Inch by inch in gradual rise
Mount the lavered masonries.
Warring questions have their day,
Kings arise and pass away,
Laborers vanish one by one,
Still the temple is not done,
Still completion seems afar.

Souls are built as temples are—
Here's a carving rich and quaint;
There the image of a saint;
Here a deep hued pane to tell
Sacred truth or miracle;
Every little helps the much,
Every careful, careless touch
Adds a charm or leaves a scar.

Souls are built as temples are—
Based on truth's eternal law
Sure and steadfast, without flaw,
Through the sunshine, through the snows,
Up and on the building goes;
Every fair thing finds its place,
Every hard thing lends a grace,
Every hand may make or mar.
—Susan Coolidge in Journal of Education.

LOVERS OF MADEIRA.

The island of Madeira is one of the world's paradises. Earth contains no fairer spot, nor is there anywhere any climate more soft and genial. Once on a time it was my lot to pass seven or eight months in that lovely isle, and as I look back to those days of roving and idling among the valleys and graves of that magical isle, where the trade wind from the sea ever cools the air and wafts the murmur of the surf on the shore at the foot of the mighty cliffs, they seem to have been literally days in a land of dreams.

In one of my cruises around the island I arrived one evening at the charming village of Machico, which lies at the bottom of a sheltered cove. The sun was setting and threw a mantle of gold over the landscape. In the purple shadow of the hills nestled the thatched cottages of the fishermen and peasants, and the mellow ring of the chapel bell floated on the calm evening air.

We drew the boat on the beach, and my men found me a comfortable room for the night near the water, where the music of the sea could soothe to healthful slumber. As we were preparing the evening meal a fisherman's boy brought some red mullets just out of the sea. After a capital meal I strolled to the water side, where there was an old fort. The muzzles of the rusty cannon were overgrown with spiders' webs, a circumstance which seemed to add to the peacefulness of the scene. And there I reflected on the legend which had given the name of Machico to that spot. Centuries had come and gone since the day when Roger Machim had landed there; but I seemed to see him there with his lady love under the dense shade of the primeval forest and their ship riding in the bay, the first perhaps which had ever been there since the creation of the world.

It was way back in the reign of King Henry VII of England, in the Fifteenth century, that those things happened of which I am writing. Anne d'Arfet, or Dorset, as some call her name, was the daughter of a titled gentleman whose manor was in the south of England, near the sea. She was attractive and beautiful and of a romantic turn of mind. Ladies who fall in love with men below them in station may be supposed to have more sentiment than love of fortune and display.

Among the relations of her father was a youth named Roger Machim. From all accounts he was handsome and chivalrous in his bearing, but of a family inferior to hers. Therefore when her parents discovered that Roger loved their daughter and that she ardently returned his affection they at once frowned on his suit and sternly forbade the lovers to meet. The haughty parents had other plans and more ambitious schemes for their daughter. Roger was dismissed with disdain, and ordered to keep his distance from the castle.

Love laughs at locks and keys, it is said by those who seem to know something about it. At any rate it proved so in this case. By the means of a trusty friend Machim contrived to communicate with his lady love. I have no opinion to express as to her conduct in corresponding with him after the express commands of her parents, because I am not acquainted with all the circumstances, and the history does not give her age. It is sufficient to know that a busy correspondence was secretly carried on which resulted in a plan for her elopement. Judging from the grim and determined character of the lady's father, Machim was convinced that it would be useless for them merely to fly to some other part of England. Sooner or later they would be discovered and he would be slain, while the lady would be forcibly carried home to end her days in despair.

It was therefore decided to fly to the coast and there take ship for France. Anne confided the secret to one of her maids, who succeeded in winning a trusty family servant to the lady's cause. Without such aid it would have been well nigh impossible to put the plan into execution. It is a sad and serious undertaking for a young woman to forsake her home, perhaps forever; it was doubly so in those olden times, when the means of travel were difficult, and to go to France was more hazardous than it is now to go to the ends of the earth.

But having once decided the lady did not hesitate. Her lover, with horses saddled and bridled, was waiting in a little wood hard by. It was dead of night when Anna d'Arfet with her maid stole softly down the dark staircase and through the winding corridors to the postern gate, where the old servant was waiting to turn the lock. They stepped forth into the cloudy, windy night and crossed the moat and the drawbridge. Then the lady paused an instant and took a last look at the battlements of her father's house. At that moment a dismal owl on a turret gave a mournful hoot, like the note of a fateful doom. The lady shuddered, dashed a tear from her eyes, drew the mantle about her and fled forever from her home.

Roger Machim was waiting in the wood with his attendants. Lightly she sprang on her horse, and then the cry was, "To spur and away!"

Bristol was the nearest port. The record does not say whether Machim chartered a ship expressly for this voyage, or engaged passage on one that was about to sail. At any rate, the ship was there waiting, and set sail as soon as the lovers arrived. She was very different from the ships we now use, and was what they called a galley. She had a very high bow and stern, towering far above the water and tapering toward the top. This made the galley look top heavy; but she was very broad at the water line and was deep qualities which made her seaworthy.

The cabin was a small, stuffy apartment, without staterooms or berths. The beds were spread on the deck. The entire ship reeked with the smell of tar and pitch and of moldy biscuit and salt fish and spirits. But perhaps people who went to sea in those days had stronger stomachs than they have now; at any rate this was the only way they had of taking a voyage; the ships slow and the comforts none. It was little consolation to those who were tossed in such a tub as that to know that the stern was profusely decorated with gilded carvings or that a rank tallow taper was ever burning before the picture of the Virgin Mary at one end of the cabin.

The galley had three short masts and three sails on yards hoisted from the deck and she had an abundance of long streamers. The captain and crew were coarse but picturesque figures, heavily bearded and brown with fighting the rough sea. They knew the way to France or Holland or Spain, although rarely sailing as far as Spain; but of aught south of it they knew little if anything, and absolutely nothing of what was westward. America had not yet been discovered and the Atlantic was to them a vast, vague mystery.

To the poor lady, flying from home and now for the first time on the sea, everything was so sad and strange and wild. Although they told her that in three or four days at farthest they hoped to land in sunny France, yet her heart was full of fears, and many a time she longed to be once more safe in the home she had left behind. But the die was cast. Even if they had been willing to return for her sake the winds were now contrary, and there was nothing to do but to keep on.

But it soon became a question whether they should be able even to reach France. It was now the season of storms, the wild month of October verging on winter, and the clumsy little galley was but ill fitted to battle with head winds and storms. It needed no barometer to tell the crew and passengers of the galley that heavy weather had set in for good. The white gulls darted swiftly round the ship over the foaming crests, the stormy petrels followed in the wake, and hour by hour the surges and angry green swelled higher and higher and tossed the little ship like an egg shell, now toward the leaden sky and now with a swift rush into the watery abyss.

Yes, it began to be a question at last not whether they should reach France, but whether they would ever again see land or make a port.

Day after day the galley scudded under a rag of canvass before the furious, howling northeaster, rolling her gunwales under and shipping tons of water that threatened to send her to the bottom. Every timber creaked and groaned, and every man on board vowed candles to the virgin or promised to do penance at the first shrine to which he should come if only heaven would bring him safe to land. They had no charts of the regions toward which they were heading.

One day through the mist the high coast of Spain was seen off Cape Finisterre. Then they knew they were across the Bay of Biscay, and began to hope the fury of the storm might slacken. Never in all their experience had the bold captain and his pilots encountered such weather. But the storm continued, and still the galley sped southward, the winds grew warmer and the skies more blue, but the wind held and the surges seemed higher than ever. One of these surges swept off the captain and several of the crew.

At last the wind moderated, and the sea began to grow more peaceful. Every one was exhausted to the last degree; they knew not where they were, and their best navigator had been lost. While they were debating what course to take a sharp sighted old salt at the mast head shouted "Land ho!"

Every one sprang on deck. It was a surprise to every one on board, for no one had ever seen nor ever heard of land in that quarter. Poor Anne d'Arfet crept out from her couch and, leaning on the arm of Roger, gazed wistfully at the gray form which rose like a mist above the sea. A mass of clouds brooded over the summit of the lofty mountains, which gradually took shape as the galley drifted toward this unknown land. Passing around a long, lofty, rocky cape, the ship came under the tremendous precipices of this newly discovered coast, and her crew gazed amazed on the dense forests which grew to the water's edge and the cataracts which, as if from the clouds, dropped to the sea.

But lovely and grand as was this sublime solitude, and pleasant as it was to see land once more, yet Roger Machim was not without fear; for the new land might be peopled by savages and cannibals or monsters, such as disturbed the imagination of the men of those days; and his conscience smote him, as if he felt that Providence had brought a punishment on them all for leading that fair young girl from her English home.

The galley dropped anchor at the entrance of an enchanting retired cove called from that time Machico, after Roger Machim. The water was deep and beautifully blue and clear. It was like molten turquois. The bottom of the ship could be distinctly seen from the surface as she floated there, and it looked for all the world as if it were made of solid turquois. The fish that darted under the keel also looked like turquois fish. Never on the coast of England had they seen any such lovely effects in the water as one sees at Madeira.

Tenderly they assisted the sick and careworn lady over the ship's side into the boat and rowed her ashore. She was, perhaps, the first woman who had stepped foot on that most witching of all the isles of the sea. They were, perhaps, the first human beings who ever trod on the yellow sands of that solitary paradise.

A clearing was soon made amid the forests that came to the shore, and a tent was soon spread out of an old sail. All were exhausted with anxiety, hardship and despair. But at last they seemed to have found a haven of repose where they could rest, gather strength and collect provisions to enable them once more to set sail for sunny France. They soon found that there were no savages, that in fact they were the only souls in that insular solitude, and that neither wild beasts nor poisonous reptiles were there to disturb them.

Anne d'Arfet, with her maid and Roger Machim, remained on shore with part of the crew; the rest of the crew kept on board to look after the ship. Everything promised well, and all went merry as a marriage bell. It seemed as if the lovers had found an ideal haven for their retreat, such as the poets sing of in their romantic dreams. Generally it is like that the year round at Madeira. But the fates seemed against poor Anne and her devoted lover, and the season seems to have been unusually inclement. On the third day after anchoring at Machico their hopes were sadly dashed when they saw another storm gathering and heard the wind moaning among the woods and rolling great rollers on the shore.

When the men on board of the galley saw the peril in which they were they slipped the cable and ran out to sea, hoping to come back with the return of fair weather; but they never returned, nor was the galley ever heard of again.

It is easy to imagine the terror and despair which came upon the fugitives left on the solitary island when they saw their ship driven to sea. The lady immediately began to droop again. In vain poor Roger attempted to cheer her with hopes that the galley would yet come back and take them home again.

She saw too well in the wan face and lusterless eyes of her lover that he had no hope of leaving this island of exile. And there she died with his name on her lips. Scarcely had they laid her away in a grave a little removed from the shore than poor Machim also yielded to his doom. His heart was broken, and in two days more the survivors folded his hands on his breast and laid him beside Anne d'Arfet.

After waiting long in vain for the galley to return the three or four sailors who were left on the island fitted up the small ship's boat left with them and started on the desperate undertaking of finding a way home, at least by falling in the track of some ship. The wind wafted them to the coast of Africa. There they were picked up by a Moorish corsair, which was cruising to attack Christian ships. The English sailors on arriving at a port were thrown into prison, where a number of other Christian captives were already lingering in chains.

Among them were some Portuguese mariners, who learned from the English captives of the island which they had discovered in so unexpected a way. After years the Portuguese mariners were ransomed and returned to Portugal. At Lisbon they met Zarco, a brave navigator at that port. To him they related the strange story learned from the English sailors. It was a period of discovery, and the Portuguese were among the foremost in leading the search for new lands.

Zarco at once fitted out a ship and found the island of Roger Machim, which he took possession of for the King of Portugal and called the island Madeira, because of its remarkable verdure. A chapel was built over the grave of Anne d'Arfet and Roger Machim, which still stands at Machico. The discovery of the island of Madeira has been of great use to the world, and thus we see again illustrated in its history the great fact—that man proposes, but God disposes.—S. G. W. Benjamin in New York Independent.

Found by a Canine Detective.

The parents of little Charley Holmes missed the boy about 5 o'clock one evening, but through the remarkable intelligence of a dog the four-year-old was returned to their arms a little after midnight.

The distracted parents reported the case to Thomas H. Buttwell, a special policeman, about 9 o'clock, and he made a close search of all the alleys and byways from Washington to Market streets, but nothing was seen of the little runaway.

Finally he left matters to his dog Gip, an animal that has a record both as a detective and life saver. The dog, after being shown some clothes worn by the boy, bounded away in the darkness. Soon a sharp, joyous bark from the canine announced a discovery, and Buttwell hurried in the direction, where he found Gip with his head between the wall of a building and a big dry goods box on the sidewalk, wagging his tail vigorously.

The policeman turned the light from his bullseye on the spot and found the lost boy sound asleep. He had wandered about for several hours, and, tired and hungry, cried himself to sleep.—San Francisco Examiner.

THE GREAT WORDS OF GREAT MEN.

A Most Remarkable Array of Outspoken Statements from Men of Mark in Both Continents.

INTERESTING FACTS AND FACES.

The orator before the Senate called this "an age of progress." He was wrong. "Progress" does not half express it; it is an age of revolution. Revolution carried on, not by armies, but by discoverers, inventors and brain-workers. It is a marvelous age, an age when the ordinary will not be accepted, when the best is demanded. Our grandfathers were content to travel in stage coaches, to live in cabins and receive a mail once a week. We demand palace cars, tasteful homes and daily communication with the world. It is the rapid-transit age; the age of the telegraph and the telephone. A man speaks to-day and the entire world reads his words to-morrow morning. There are but twenty-four hours in a day, but forty-eight hours are crowded into it.

WILLIAM EDWARD ROBESON, M. R. C. S. L., L. K. Q. C. I.
Late of the Royal Navy of England.

I emphatically state that I have been able to give more relief and effect more cures by the use of Warner's Safe Cure than by all the medicines in the British Pharmacopoeia

Wm. Edwd. Robson

We all know how we have advanced materilly. Do we realize how we have advanced scientifically? More than in any other manner. Indeed, it has been the advancement in science which has caused the advancement in material things. The discovery of steam permitted the railroad and the steamboat. The development of electricity made possible the telegraph and the telphone, so that the developement of the sciences has been the real cause of all modern advancement.

We will take, for example, one department of science, but the most important department. One which affects our very lives and happiness. Formerly the treatment of human ills was made a matter of superstition, of incantation, the same as it is by the medicine men of the Indians to-day. Gradually emerging from such blindness, it was still a matter of bigotry, of folly. What people must have suffered in those days can scarcely be imagined. They were bled, they were cupped, they were leeched, they were subjected to every device whereby their vitality could be reduced and their lives endangered. It is almost a wonder that the race survived.

There has been an absolute revolution in the practice of medicine and in the treatment of human ills. Instead of undermining the vital forces by cupping and bleeding, the vitality is now sustained in every possible manner. Instead of tearing down we seek to build up. Instead of increasing misery we seek to create happiness.

But the greatest advancement in medical science has been made by discovery. Harvey could afford to endure the ridicule of the world for revealing to it the grand discovery of the circulation of the blood. Jenner might be ostracised, but millions have benefited by his discovery of vaccination. Pasteur lived in a more enlightened age and escaped ridicule, while the world received the benefit which his discoveries have brought. Koch, although forced to reveal his disvovery before its perfection, will be revered by future generations.

The discoveries of these great men have been of untold benefit to the world, and yet they were not in the line of the world's greatest need. Mankind has been suffering, enduring, dying from a cause far greater than small-pox, more terrible than hydrophobia and more subtle than consumption. The habits of modern life, the very inventions which have made civilization so great, have drained the vital forces of life and undermined the organs that sustain life. Ten years ago this great truth was realized by a gentleman whose own life was in sore jeopardy, and the discovery which he has given to the world has done and is doing more to-day to strengthen the vitality, lessen suffering, preserve the health and lengthen life than any of the discoveries of the other great men above mentioned. The discovery referred to was made by Mr. H. H. Warner, of Rochester, N. Y., and is known in Europe, in America, and throughout the world as Warner's Safe Cure.

It may perhaps be thought that the above assertion is an extravagant one, and so it would be were not the unquestionable proofs present to verify it. Within the past few years the claims made more than ten years ago have been admitted by the highest scientific authorities, both in Europe and America, and it is with pleasure that we present herewith some remarkable reproduced statements, together with the faces of the men who made them.

Kidney troubles, resulting far too often in Bright's disease, are the great evil of modern life. They frequently come silently and unannounced. Their presence far too often is not realized until their treacherous fangs have been fixed upon the vital portion of life. Nothing can be more deceptive, for their symptoms are varied in nearly every instance. Thousands of persons have been their victims without realizing or knowing what it is that afflicted them. Thousands are suffering to-day who do not know the cause. The following outspoken words, however, show what wonderful things this great remedy has done:

ALF. CAMPBELL, M. D., Durham, Ala.: "Some eight years ago I was suffering from functional kidney trouble. I took the usual treatment, but the preparations being bad to the taste, I bought a bottle of Warner's SAFE Cure, scarcely thinking I would derive any benefit from it; but in a short time I was well again. I did not take all of one bottle."

ALBERT W. HENDRICKS, M. D., West Philadelphia, Pa.: "In Warner's SAFE Cure the profession have an article much needed. I have successfully treated cases of Bright's disease and diseases to which the female sex is subject with it, and I cheerfully recommend it as an invaluable remedy for kidney, liver or bladder difficulties."

T. JONES, M. D., Albany, Ga.: "I have used Warner's SAFE Cure in the case of my son for diseased kidneys, following hemorrhagic yellow fever, with perfect success."

DR. BEYER, OF WURZBURG, GERMANY.

Louis N. Beyer
Würzburg
Dr. of Phil.

DR. DIO LEWIS.

J. M. CARD, M. D., St. Mary's, Pa.: "I have used Warner's SAFE Cure for my own benefit, and I am pleased to state that it has done me more good than any medicine I have ever tried for kidney troubles. I am recommending it to my patients."

JOHN W. MAPES, M. D., Paris, Ill.: "Before I was aware that I had kidney disease I had transient pains all over me, but they have entirely disappeared, and to-day I am an example of the virtues of SAFE Cure, without which I should long since have been dead."

If I found myself the victim of a serious kidney trouble I should at once use Warner's Safe Cure

Dio Lewis

DR. R. A. GUNN,
Dean of the United States Medical College, New York, and Editor of the Medical Tribune.

I prescribe and use Warner's Safe Cure in both acute and chronic Bright's disease and am willing to acknowledge and commend it most heartily.

R. A. Gunn M.D.

L. B. PRICE, M. D., Handford P. O., Va.: "In 1882 I was a sufferer from a severe kidney affection. My physicians pronounced it Bright's disease, and some of the most prominent and skillful of our profession treated me, but without the slightest benefit. In despair I tried several alleged specifics, but got no better. I also tried celebrated waters, but still with no benefit. I then read an account of Warner's SAFE Cure, began its use and in a few months was entirely cured. I have never since had the slightest symptom of my old and terrible trouble. I have recommended Warner's SAFE Cure to many patients, and in every case they have improved. I firmly believe this remedy was the sole means of saving my life."

M. PITCHER, M. D., Sardinia, N. Y.: "I have advised the using of Warner's SAFE Cure in several cases where it proved very beneficial."

J. J. GOODYEAR, M. D., Groten, N.Y.: "I have been acquainted for some time with Warner's SAFE Cure, and have known of some remarkable cures effected by it. As a professional man and practicing physician I can cheerfully recommend it in all cases of kidney and liver difficulties."

The discovery made by Mr. H. H. Warner has been acknowledged throughout both hemispheres to be the only discovery for this great modern evil now known to the world. Like all great discoveries, it has had its enemies and met with opposition, but its marvelous popularity with the public has been phenomenal and its complete acknowledgement by scientists and the professions has been deserved. It stands as it deserves to stand, upon a plane of its own, pre-eminent among all prominent discoveries for the relief of humanity and the promotion of happiness.

WHAT IS YOUR SON TO BE?

A Field Offered by the Growing Electric Business.

WONDERFUL ADVANCE OF ELECTRICITY.

Progressed Faster Than the Intelligence Necessary to Handle it.

Two men were sitting face to face between the car tracks on Park row the other day. It seemed to be a dangerous position, for they could not follow their work and at the same time keep their eyes on the rattling teams on either hand. They had to keep their elbows in too or the cars would bump them. They were seated at a manhole, testing cables of wire which were in the subway beneath. Each had the end of a cable in hand and a portable galvanometer—a square box about the size of a cigar box—in front of him.

But a few years ago the man engaged in connecting wires in this way touched the tip of each wire in turn to the tip of his tongue. If there was a current running through the wire he felt a little pricking and a sour taste. He did this the whole day through, and was none the worse for receiving so many slight electric shocks and tasting so much copper.

It was a very primitive test, but a very good one, and old wire testers still use it when in a hurry. But soon a galvanometer was made, which not only finds the current but gives some idea of its strength. The rapid way in which invention has been piled upon invention in the electrical world is marvelous, and it seems surprising that a sufficient number of workmen of sufficient intelligence should be found in such a hurry to practically put these inventions into use.

A question upon this very point was put to a well known electrician who happened to saunter by the two men at work.

BAD WORK.

"It is only surprising in a measure," he said. "As a matter of fact, the business has grown much faster than the intelligence necessary to handle it, and many accidents are due to that fact. The electric light people at first had to rely very largely on the workmen engaged by the telegraph companies, and both had to draft in a large number of new men and train them to the work. Any man with a little knowledge of mechanics and the handling of tools soon makes a good lineman. There is no great skill required, except in care that the wire does not become abraded in handling, while the good wages paid for the work—seventy-five dollars a month—are a great inducement. But the business has undoubtedly suffered in its rapid progress for the want of skilled men, and the market is by no means overstocked yet. Only the other day one of the New York companies had to send to the New England Cable company to borrow men to make joints in city lines.

"Some of the underground work, too, has been badly done, but much of this has been quite as much due to keen competition and the proverbial economy of the unscientific stockholders. When it comes to buying wire, costing from $1,400 to $1,500 a mile, the stockholder has a lot to say about it, and cheap wire is too often a result. One of the electric light companies runs an alternating current, and it now begins to find, all over the country, that its wires are already becoming faulty. They cannot stand the strain.

CHANCE FOR YOUNG MEN.

"One of the things absorbing the attention of electric men today is to find an insulator which will stand heavy alternating currents. So the trouble has been as much a matter of cheap material as unskilled labor."

"Have the workmen a union yet?"

"No, not yet. There is an association called the Society of Electrical Engineers."

[illegible] start, and readily get more according to the ability they display.

"It is a great business for a man to get into, whether he is well educated or not. There is such an enormous field for the application of electric power outside of the electric light. See how fast the electric street cars have grown throughout the country! Then there are the other almost innumerable applications of the force which will soon be in demand. No, sir, the skilled workman who goes into the electric business, of whatever grade he may be, need feel no fears of his labor market being overcrowded."—New York Advertiser.

As George Humphreville was seated in a car going to Lancaster a few days ago a mouse sprang from the back of a seat in front of him and landed beneath the collar of his coat. In a twinkling the rodent was in the sleeve of Mr. Humphreville's coat, and then there was considerable commotion in the car. The mouse was finally expelled from the undesirable hiding place, but not too soon for the peace of mind of his victim.—Philadelphia Record.

A WHALER AT THE FAIR.

A Famous "Blubber Hunter" to Be Exhibited at Chicago.

At one of the wharves of New Bedford, Mass., lies in a half dismantled condition the old whaler Franklin. She is but a 73-ton schooner, yet she was famous in the palmy days of whalers and sealers, was built at Eastport, Me., in 1833, and has taken in one short voyage off Newfoundland enough oil, bone and skins for the captain's share to amount to $24,000. And now that captain intends to take her to Chicago, refitted as in her best days, and make her a part of the great exhibit at the World's fair.

THE FRANKLIN.

Captain Henry Clay is one of those retired seamen who make so large a part of the population of New Bedford, and takes much pride in the old schooner that served him well. She will start next summer rigged and manned as though for a whaling voyage, and make the trip by way of the St. Lawrence, Welland canal and lakes, exhibiting at all the principal cities on the way. On her deck will be the boilers and other apparatus used in rendering whale fat into oil, and all the available interior will be a museum of objects in the whaling line, from a whale's head and bones to harpoon and knives, and such will be her exhibit on Lake Michigan.

Captain Clay says that in eight years the Franklin netted him $85,000 in oil, bone and ambergris, yet her most famous voyage was toward the south two years ago, when commanded by Captain Rose. On the night of July 15, 1889, Captain Rose and crew reached and rescued twenty-five passengers of the schooner Antarctic, which had burned at sea, for which congress awarded the vessel $3,500.

SIXTY-FIVE YEARS A POET.

Nearly All His Life the Famous Ruskin Has Made Verses.

John Ruskin will soon complete his seventy-second year, and for sixty-five of those years he has been a poet, for at the age of seven he wrote in blank verse a singular essay on "Time." Crude and childish as it is, it shows signs of power. The next year he wrote an invocation to the sun to shine on his garden, which is an amusing, almost a pathetic, mixture of poetry and bathos. At the age of twenty he gained the Newdigate prize for English poetry, and soon after abandoned the muse because, as he said, he could not express his ideas in verse.

JOHN RUSKIN.
[From his latest portrait.]

In later years he returned to poetry, and this last autumn, for the first time, all his poetical works were published in one collection. Many of these pieces might with propriety be dismissed as "childish." Indeed, the editors of the work have either exercised very little discrimination, or decided that it was best for the reading public to form its views on the whole work of the poet. Mr. Ruskin did not make the collection, and many of the pieces were written simply to amuse children and relatives. Extravagancies, nursery songs and rhymed letters on purely personal affairs are good enough for intimate friends who know all the facts, but they are not "Ruskinesque."

He Has Taken High Rank.

Marshall Halstead, first son of Murat Halstead, has taken high place among progressive western journalists. It has been earned by merit and exertion. He is only twenty-eight years of age, but he has crowded the last ten of these full with study of the problem of how to make a modern daily newspaper a success, and always with particular reference to the Cincinnati Commercial Gazette. He appreciated early the fact that there would devolve upon him, as eldest son, the succession in the enterprise in which his father has been so conspicuous.

MARSHALL HALSTEAD.

At Princeton he was a member of the class of 1886. As soon as he was graduated he entered into the service of The Commercial Gazette as New York representative, and was there two years. Then he was summoned to Cincinnati, where as night editor he developed a zeal that at once made him conspicuous. In the late complications he held his course with a discretion that confirmed him in the regard of every one associated with the paper, and [illegible] vice president of the company chargeable with the general management.

TAKEN FOR A LUNATIC.

A Traveling Man's Annoying Predicament.

A JOKE THAT ENDED DISASTROUSLY.

Trouble Caused by Plastering a Trunk With Theatrical Posters.

"I have in my life," said the colonel, "been severely misjudged. In fact, a case of mistaken identity nearly cost me my neck once, when some Colorado cowboys did me the honor to take me for a horse thief. Of course that was unpleasant. No man who has any regard for his reputation cares to be lynched, however innocent he may be. As I said, I have been taken for a horse thief. I have been held up by highwaymen. I have been forced by public opinion to take part in a lynching. I have been accused of 'squatting' when the claim was clearly my own, and gracefully yielded to a cogent argument—a six shooter. I have had many little experiences more exciting than enjoyable, but I think that the one which caused me more genuine woe than any other was a trip which I recently made.

"I lent a trunk to a friend of mine a few weeks ago. I am not going to tell you his name, nor am I going to give you the real name of the play which his company was giving. But it was a great deal like 'An Honest Thief,' fully as discreditable, anyway. When my trunk was returned to me it was literally plastered over with slips of paper, on which were printed the words, 'An Honest Thief.' You could not stick a pin against that trunk without running it through one of those slips.

"When I was on my trip, having taken along this trunk, I noticed that I drew a great deal of attention. I got used to the advertisements on my trunk, but other people did not.

"At a hotel in Chicago a man came up to me, and after striking up a conversation turned it upon the subject of trunks. Soon he asked me what my object was in labeling myself 'an honest thief.' I thought it would be a fine joke to make him believe that I was serious, and I fenced with him.

"The next morning I noticed that every one in the hotel looked at me askance. Even the waiters treated me as a sort of a mild lunatic. This was great fun, but it became very embarrassing when I endeavored to be serious upon serious subjects. Every one answered me in a soothing way. I began to get very tired of my joke. I went to the chief hotel clerk.

"'See here,' I said, 'it's about time this honest thief business was put an end to, isn't it?'

"'Certainly, sir,' he answered, in a reassuring tone.

"'Of course it's all a joke,' I went on.

"'Certainly, sir,' said the clerk, 'every one knows that you aren't a thief.'

"'I should hope so,' I cried, getting angry.

"'There, there, sir,' he said gently. 'I'll have that matter attended to.'

"'What matter?' I said furiously. 'Do you think that I am a lunatic to be treated this way?'

"'Most assuredly not,' he answered in tones which said emphatically that most assuredly he did.

"'Well, you may make out my bill.'

"'All right, sir,' he responded gratefully.

"I went up to my room. A chambermaid was there gazing at the labels. When she saw me she gave me a frightened look and started for the door.

"'Come back,' I said sternly.

"She stood still with bated breath.

"'What are you running away for?' I asked.

"'Towels, sir,' she gasped.

"'You are not. You think I am crazy.'

"'Oh, no, sir,' she answered, edging toward the door.

"'Come back,' I cried, but she had fled.

"I rang the bell violently and long.

"A porter came up carrying a coal hod in one hand and a murderous looking poker in the other. He stuck his shaven head in the door and glanced about him suspiciously.

"'Why did you bring that coal?' I asked.

"'Didn't you want it?' he said, placing the scuttle on the floor, but grasping the poker more firmly.

"'I did not.'

"'What did you ring for, sir?' he said, watching me closely and hanging to his poker.

"'I want those labels taken off my trunk.'

"He looked at the trunk, then at me and then at the poker in his big fist.

"'I can't take 'em off alone,' he said.

"'Why, certainly you can,' I answered indignantly. 'See here,' and I advanced to show him how it could be done.

"'Don't ye come near me!' he shouted, backing into a corner and brandishing his poker. 'If ye do I'll brain ye, ye murderin' lunatic!' His eyes were wild and he was the picture of desperation.

"'Take off those labels,' I exclaimed authoritatively.

"'Sure an' ye doan' git me down on me knees before ye,' he said stubbornly. 'I'll keep me eye on ye. If ye touch me I'll brain ye,' he cried wildly, as I started toward him in indignation to throw him out of the room. He rushed for the door and tore down the corridor with a wild yell.

"I got down on my knees and scraped off the labels. Then I packed my trunk and started down to the office to pay my bill. The elevator boy pretended not to see me and went past my floor. When I called him and punched the bell he came back with ashen lips.

"'What do you mean,' I asked, 'by going past me in that insolent way?'

"He looked at me in terror and dodged out of the elevator car, leaving me in it alone.

"I walked down to the office, and, paying my bill, ordered the clerk to send for my baggage. When it came down the porters piled it up and stood aloof from it as if it were dynamite. One of them spoke to the hackman in an undertone and the fellow grasped his whip by the wrong end. When I had entered the cab he stood beyond my reach and looked at me fiercely.

"'I'll dhrive ye to the daypot,' he said, 'but doan't ye make no trouble or I'll have ye ahrrested, shure as me name is Moike McGhinnesy.'

"I never was so glad to get out of a town in my life, and when the next theatrical man wants to borrow a trunk he need not come to your humble servant."—New York Tribune.

Too Gentlemanly.

Daughter—But, pa, all the people whom Mr. Nicefello has dealings with speak of him as a perfect gentleman.

Practical Pa—That's because the young fellow is such a fool that he never knows when he's being swindled.

RATHER A NUMEROUS MAN.

A Commuter Has Fun with an Obdurate and Thick Headed Ferry Man.

"It is a singular thing," remarked one man to another as they made their way toward the ferry waiting room, "how long it takes the average man to get accustomed to faces that he is seeing every day. That fellow at the gate makes me show my commutation ticket every time I come through, though he sees me every day. I never have any trouble with the train conductor, but that's because he is a man of unusual intelligence. I have met many conductors who would make you show your ticket at every station, and would never get to know you, even if you rode with them twice a day.

"That's the kind of a man that fellow at the gate is. It's awfully provoking when you're running for a boat to have to stop, unbutton your overcoat and get your ticket out of your inside coat pocket. I'm a pious man, but it makes me swear sometimes."

As the two walked about waiting for the boat, an idea struck the man who had been talking.

"It would be interesting," said he, "to see how many times a fellow could walk through that gate without being recognized. Suppose we try it?"

"All right," said his friend.

The commuter went out through the wagon gateway into the street. He returned through the passenger gate, and had to show his ticket. He tried again, with the same result. He tried several times more, and still the obdurate gateman failed to recognize him. There were few people going through at that time, and it was singular that his continued reappearance was not noticed. Persistence did, however, have an effect at last. On the sixth trip through the gateway the gatekeeper stared at him in a rather bewildered manner. On the seventh trip the gatekeeper swore gently to himself, and demanded to see the name on the commuter's ticket. The commuter permitted him to read it, and on reaching the waiting room said to his friend: "He has found out my name. Lend me your ticket."

On the eighth trip through the gateway he showed his friend's ticket. The gatekeeper swore loudly as he approached.

"I've got you," said he; "you can't make game of me. Let me see the name on that ticket."

The commuter assumed an air of indignation, but complied.

"Well, I'm beat," exclaimed the gateman, as he read the ticket. And he scratched his head in perplexity.

"What do you mean by addressing such harsh remarks to me?" asked the commuter.

"Well, I'll tell you, stranger," said the gateman in an apologetic tone, "you're the most numerous man I ever ran across. Chaps looking just like you have been passing through this gateway in a regular stream for the last fifteen minutes, an' I began to think it was some fellow making game of me. But I guess it must be something the matter with my eyes, for I see by your ticket that you're not the feller I was layin' for."—New York Tribune.

Two Famous London Streets.

Paternoster row is the name of a street in London almost under the shadow of St. Paul's cathedral. It is so called, according to antiquarians, from the fact that 400 or 500 years ago the makers of rosaries or pater nosters lived and had their shops there. As education became general religious books were added to the stock in trade, and in course of time the entire street was given up to publishers and stationers' establishments. No vehicles were formerly allowed to enter the street, which, although in the midst of a great metropolis, was thus kept quiet, and even at present it is not a general thoroughfare.

Many of the essayists and poets of a century ago mention it, and not always in the most reverential terms. As Paternoster row was the publication center, so Grub street, now Milton street, so called not from the poet, but from a wealthy builder, was the headquarters of the writing fraternity. It was filled with houses of mean aspect and poor interior, hence the name came to be applied to trashy and worthless productions.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Convenient Trunk Labels.

The most expensive of trunks, portmanteaus, etc., are soon rendered unsightly by the repeated pasting on of labels. All this may be avoided, it appears, by the use of an English invention, which consists of a base of tough, flexible board on which are placed, one on top of the other, twelve parchment paper labels, the whole being securely fastened together, with metal clips and an eyelet to carry the string for attachment to luggage. The frequent attachment of fresh labels is thus avoided, as the old or directed surfaces have simply to be torn off as used and a fresh one is always ready for redirection until the "tablet" is exhausted.—New York Telegram.

You never saw such a commotion up and down a house in all your life as when my Uncle Podger undertook to do a job. A picture would have come home from the framemaker's and be standing in the dining room waiting to be put up, and Aunt Podger would ask what was to be done with it, and Uncle Podger would say:

"Oh, you leave that to me. Don't you, any of you, worry yourselves about that. I'll do all that."

And then he would take off his coat and begin. He would send the girl out for sixpen'orth of nails, and then one of the boys after her to tell her what size to get, and from that he would gradually work down, and start the whole house.

"Now you go and get me my hammer, Will," he would shout; "and you bring me the rule, Tom; and I shall want the step ladder, and I had better have a kitchen chair, too; and Jim you run round to Mr. Goggles, and tell him, 'Pa's kind regards, and hopes his leg's better, and will he lend him his spirit level?' And don't you go, Maria, because I shall want somebody to hold me the light; and when the girl comes back she must go out again for a bit of picture cord; and Tom—where's Tom?—Tom, you come here; I shall want you to hand me up the picture."

And then he would lift up the picture and drop it, and it would come out of the frame, and he would try to save the glass and cut himself; and then he would spring round the room looking for his handkerchief. He could not find his handkerchief, because it was in the pocket of the coat he had taken off, and he did not know where he had put the coat, and all the house had to leave off looking for his tools and start looking for his coat, while he would dance around and hinder them.

"Doesn't anybody in the whole house know where my coat is? I never came across such a set in all my life—upon my word I didn't. Six of you—and you can't find a coat that I put down not five minutes ago! Well, of all the"——

Then he'd get up, and find that he had been sitting on it, and would call out:

"Oh, you can give it up! I've found it myself now. Might just as well ask the cat to find anything as expect you people to find it."

And when half an hour had been spent in tying up his finger, and a new glass had been got, and the tools, and the ladder, and the chair, and the candle had been brought, he would have another go, the whole family, including the girl and the charwoman, standing round in a semi-circle, ready to help. Two people would have to hold the chair, and a third would help him up on it, and hold him there, and a fourth would hand him a nail, and a fifth would pass him up the hammer, and he would take hold of the nail and drop it.

"There!" he would say in an injured tone; "now the nail's gone."

And we would all have to go down on our knees and grovel for it, while he would stand on the chair and grunt, and want to know if he was to be kept there all the evening.

The nail would be found at last, and by that time he would have lost the hammer.

"Where's the hammer? What did I do with the hammer? Great heavens! Seven of you gaping round there, and you don't know what I did with the hammer!"

We would find the hammer for him, and then he would have lost sight of the mark he had made on the wall where the nail was to go in, and each of us had to get up on a chair beside him, and see if we could find it; and we would each discover it in a different place, and he would call us all fools, one after another, and tell us to get down. And he would take the rule and remeasure, and find that he wanted half of 31¾ inches from the corner, and would try to do it in his head and go mad.

And we would all try to do it in our heads, and all arrive at different results, and sneer at one another. And in the general row the original number would be forgotten, and Uncle Podger would have to measure it again.

He would use a bit of string this time, and at the critical moment, when the old fool was leaning over the chair at an angle of 45 degs., and trying to reach a point three inches beyond what was possible for him to reach, the string would slip, and down he would slide onto the piano, a really fine musical effect being produced by the suddenness with which his head and body struck all the notes at the same time.

And Aunt Maria would say that she would not allow the children to stand around and hear such language.

At last Uncle Podger would get the spot fixed again, and put the point of the nail on it with his left hand and take the hammer in his right hand. And with the first blow he would smash his thumb and drop the hammer with a yell on somebody's toes.

Aunt Maria would mildly observe that next time Uncle Podger was going to hammer a nail in the wall she hoped he'd let her know in time, so that she could make arrangements to go and spend a week with her mother while it was being done.

"Oh, you women, you make such a fuss over everything," Uncle Podger would reply, picking himself up. "Why, [illegible] little job of this sort."

And then he would have another, and at the second blow the nail would go clean through the plaster, and half a hammer after it, and Uncle Podger would precipitated against the wall with force nearly sufficient to flatten his nose.

Then we had to find the rule and the string again, and a new hole was made; and about midnight the picture would be up—very crooked and insecure, the wall for yards round looking as if it had been smoothed down with a rake, and everybody dead beat and wretched—except Uncle Podger.

"There you are," he would say, stepping heavily off the chair onto the char woman's corns, and surveying the mess he had made with evident pride. "Why, some people would have had a man to do a little thing like that!"—Jerome K. Jerome's Three Men in a Boat.

Why She Didn't Laugh.

"We had more fun at the party the other night than I ever saw in my life," said a little St. Anthony Hill girl to her mother.

"What was the cause of your hilarity?" inquired the interested parent.

"One of the girls fell right through a chair, and everybody laughed but me."

"Why didn't you laugh?"

"I—I—I was the little girl who fell through the chair."—St. Paul Pioneer Press.

ONE OF A VANISHING RACE.

He Hunts Over Wide Areas and Is at Home Wherever There Is Wilderness.

The professional hunters and trappers who at one time comprised the whole of the white inhabitant class in this section are becoming so few that a real old time solitary woodsman who plunges into the forest and divests himself of human companionship is becoming a rare sight. Joe Thomas is one of the best examples that remain of these men, and a study of his characteristics is interesting.

Thomas is a man of about forty. He is slightly below medium height and is not heavily built. He appears like a full blooded negro, although he says that his mother was a half breed Indian. He has sparse, tightly curled whiskers and does not look like a Nimrod and a mighty man among coons and deer. Thomas follows as near the life of the red man as any one can in these days, and has an antipathy to human society, though he is nothing of a misanthrope, and talks well to any one who questions him.

In the summer time Thomas works at whatever he can get to do about the cities in this vicinity and through to Ohio. When the squirrel season opens he is in Ohio, and puts in the first few weeks of the autumn shooting squirrel. As the deer season opens, he emigrates northward, and for the rest of the winter lives the life of the solitary hunter, shunning human habitations and sleeping in the woods in the most inclement weather. His domestic outfit consists of a tent, blankets and a small stove, and he declares that he is more contented in the woods than he would be in town. When the night is cold he lights his fire, chains his dog up in the tent and sleeps. While the deer run, Hopkins follows them tirelessly, and when night overtakes him on the trail he lies down in the woods to sleep, confident that the deer is as tired as he and will not move during the night unless disturbed, and in the morning will be so stiff that the second day's chase will be a comparatively easy matter.

After the deer season is over Thomas starts for the open, and traps skunks and otter and all other fur bearing animals for the rest of the winter. At all times he is ready in case old Zip Coon comes racking around, and his dog he alleges to be one of the best coon dogs in the country. The animal is a liver and white hound, slightly larger than a foxhound, and with no more fat on him than is required to grease his joints. Thomas said that the dog got him more than fifty dollars' worth of coonskins in one season, and he would not part with him for three times that amount. Joe tells a story to illustrate the sagacity of the dog.

He says that one winter the dog treed a coon in a big tree. Joe always carries climbing irons, and he skinned up the tree. He followed the coon out on a branch and shook him off, and he heard him squeal as the dog nabbed him. When Joe got to the bottom of the tree there was no coon in sight and no dog. He heard the dog running and called to him; the dog came out of the bushes a moment and then ran back. Joe followed and found that the dog was running around a skunk, keeping it from going into its hole. Mr. Dog did not want to interview the skunk closely, but the skunk was not sure of that, and he kept his eye on the dog, circling around, and the dog was gradually getting him away from his hole. Joe killed the skunk, but he could find no trace of the coon, and concluded that the dog had lost it.

The next morning he reproved the dog, saying: "You didn't do right about that coon last night; you lost him. Now you go get him." The dog looked kind of ashamed and moved off. Joe followed him, and they went back to the place where the trouble occurred on the previous night. After nosing around a while the dog unburied the coon from where he had buried it, having been afraid to leave it while he went after the skunk, so he buried it, leaving the tail sticking out of the snow so he could find it again.

Some one asked Thomas if he was not afraid that the bears would eat him some night. He said that the only thing that made him mad was that the bears kept away from him and didn't give him a chance. Joe says that the houses are getting altogether too thick, and when he meets up with a house he wants to get as far away from it as he can and as quick as he can.—Oil City Derrick.

Cheaper in the End.

Boutton—So you are not going to housekeeping when you get married?

De Boarder—No. We shall take board for a year.

"Isn't that rather an extravagant way to begin?"

"Not at all. I desire my wife to study economy of my landlady. Then we will [illegible] housekeeping, and I will make her [illegible] as much a week as we [illegible] think will be the re[illegible] time we are old she [illegible] about a million."—New [illegible]

Not to Be Taken Literally.

"Is it your opinion," said the theological professor, "that the portion of the parable which represents the prodigal son as feeding among swine is to be taken literally?"

"Perhaps not," the thoughtful young man replied; "maybe it is a reference to the meals he ate at a railway lunch counter."—Washington Star.

HORRORS OF SIBERIA.

A Tale of Suffering Told by Count Langowski.

FOURTEEN YEARS A PRISONER OF WAR.

Terrible Scenes in Cold North Asia.—Fearful Atrocites.

In his narrative of the "Count of Monte Cristo" Alexander Dumas endeavors to establish the proposition that those who have suffered most are capable of enjoying most. If that be true, Count Langowski, an employe at Hudson's clothing store, has an enormous capacity for appreciating the good things of life, though even his present straitened circumstances do not permit an excessive indulgence in them. Count Langowski, as he would be entitled to be called in Poland, though preferring plain Frank Langowski, resides at 505 Fremont street with his wife and two children. He is very short of stature, very thick set, very white-haired, though only 54 years old, and very cheerful in disposition, notwithstanding his sufferings entitle him to be known as a man of many sorrows. He speaks eight languages, in one of which he detailed the thrilling story of his life—how for fourteen years he was a Russian political prisoner in the wilds of Siberia, hated, despised, beaten with stripes, starved and frozen.

CAPTURED IN WAR.

It was in 1863 that the Poles rebelled against Russia, said he, in very fair English. I was then 27 years old, single, and lived with my father, Count Langowski, on a large farm near Warsaw. My father's estate was large and he was one of the leading noblemen of the state. The rebel general, Taczanowski, billeted 500 of his troops upon us, and although our family had in no wise participated in the revolt, to refuse levy meant expatriation. Therefore my father acquiesced. Against these 500 troops Russia sent 3,700 men and sixty cannon. The battle was short and decisive, resulting in the killing and capturing of the whole 500. Six horses from our stables that had been pressed into service were killed and two of our men who were driving. The third man was whipped nearly to death after the capture and then bayoneted.

I was taken prisoner, and soon set out with hundreds of others on our way to Siberia. Think of a journey of over 3,000 miles on foot, requiring thirteen months, with heavy chains on each ankle and chained by the wrist to another in a gang of 100! That is the way we made the trip, most of the time the weather being bitterly cold, with the meanest kind of clothing, and only allowed seven copecks, less than five cents, a day for food. At night we slept in etapes—long, low, log or stone sheds—erected every ten miles along the way, more often without fire than with it, always hungry, always cold, and always in pain from the galling chains.

At last, after thirteen months of misery, we arrived at the end of our journey to encounter worse misery still. I was set to work in the quicksilver mines. Three months is as long as any human being can stand it to work in those mines. Many die in the mines and many soon after leaving them. The fumes of the mercury rot the bones, loosen the teeth and leave the man a total wreck. When I had partly regained my health after this experience I with others was set to digging holes in the ground. The holes were not designed for any use whatever, but were dug just to keep us at work, and it was while thus engaged that I received my first whipping. I was too weak to smooth the side of the hole as nicely as the officer wanted it, and simply told him so.

FEARFUL FLOGGINGS.

For that I was taken to the whipping bench, laid on my face and fastened down by three thongs, one of which was passed over the neck, one over the body and one over the legs, so arranged that a man cannot make the least movement. I received eighty blows with the knout, and was two months and a half in the hospital before I could leave my bed.

These knouts are of stout leather, the points of the lashes being loaded with lead, and a blow from them in the hands of a strong man is as bad as a stroke from a policeman's club. I have seen men killed at the third stroke. After my first whipping I received another of 125 lashes for calling a soldier a dog who had bayoneted a prisoner in cold blood. I was nearly killed, and it was almost a year before I could resume work. The scenes of brutality to be witnessed on all sides were [illegible] frightful. The killing of pri[illegible] soldiers was terrible. They [illegible] restraint whatever, and th[illegible] were killed for uttering th[illegible] in protest against the mo[illegible]ders.

Out of the 95,000 prisoners se[illegible] by the Russian government at the en[illegible] the rebellion I don't believe 5,000 ever got back alive. And not one of them guilty of a crime, but simply prisoners of war. But if the fate of the men was hard, that of the women was infinitely more so. They were whipped with stout gads instead of the knout—that is the only difference I was ever able to observe. They were whipped and poisoned to death in the hospitals by hundreds, and every public indecency heaped upon them. Even their efforts at suicide were laughed at as a jo[illegible]e.

I was six years a prisoner in chains, and six years a prisoner under surveillance. At the end of six years I was obliged to support myself, but was required to report daily to a certain officer. I supported myself by making cigarettes, and then after thirteen years was given a passport back to Poland. A man cannot travel half a mile in Russia without a passport. I begged my way from town to town, and when about half way back received some money from my sister. On reaching home I found an order from the czar requiring me to quit Poland within twenty-four hours on pain of death. I had just time to marry the girl I was betrothed to and hurried away to Cracow, thence to Antwerp, where a Polish friend assisted me to America. I have been here ten years, and although I am very poor nothing on earth would induce me to leave American soil.—Detroit Free Press.

Among the marvels of human skill and ingenuity exhibited by the London Mechanical and Scientific society may be mentioned an instrument loaned by the great Armstrong gun works which accurately measures thicknesses down to the one-thousandth of an inch; a similar instrument by a rival mechanic which grades thicknesses in one-millionth parts; a scale by Oertling, the world famous balance maker, which turns with the one-thousandth of a grain while loaded with 3,000 grains, and an engine by a Paddington watchmaker which contains 122 pieces, not including thirty-three bolts and screws, and can be hidden in a lady's No. 7 thimble.—Philadelphia Record.

A strong recommendation of Cleveland for the Presidensy is the fact that his nomination was made in spite of the bitter opposition of hack politicians. He is proved beyond question to be a man who cannot be influenced, much less controlled, by the political schemers or corporate influence. Repeatedly while President his official acts were done in direct opposition to what he was told would be his interest politically, but this made no difference to him; he did it because he thought it was right. It is safe to say that this nomination came to him without the slightest trace of effort on his part to secure it. In the awful and degrading scramble for political position it is gratifying to every citizen who wants a clean administration to see a man chosen as a candidate for the Presidency who is known to be of such sterling integrity who will sacrifice all political considerations for what he knows is right.

The better element of the Republican party is trying to avert the injury done by the scandalous convention held at Stockton. Under the very significant heading of "The Way Out of a Bad Dilemma," the San Francisco Bulletin recently published a long editorial urging that another convention be called to undo the work of the railroad tools who met at Stockton and says: "A new convention can to a large extent neutralize the bad effects of the Stockton platform. It can remove the railroad collar which is now supposed to be securely fastened around the neck of the party.---- There ought to be a general rejoicing over the opportunity which a second convention offers to extricate the party from the unfortunate dilemma in which it has been placed.---- It means the giving of the nomination in most of the Congressional districts to the railroad. Most people now think that we have given that corporation already sticks enough to break over our own backs." When the most respectable Republican paper in the State publishes such words as these the party must be in a bad way. It is evident that on the part of the intelligent and thinking mass of Republicans, through whose influence all that is glorious in the history of the party has been accomplished, are tired of being used merely to put scheming politicians in office and keep them there.

The monopolists will make the most desperate efforts to secure the election of Harrison. Not that they care so very much about the Presidency, but if the head of the ticket is elected it will carry with it Congressmen, Judges and others who are most useful tools to them. Already instructions have been given to office-holders and wire pullers in every county in our own State to do all in their power to prevent the nomination for Congress or the Legislature of any man who cannot be relied upon to serve corporations.

[illegible]ariff rates were so high that not [illegible]worth of any foreign goods [illegible] of any kind could be [illegible] the United States, yet [illegible] not benefit farmers one [illegible]. The reasons for this is that railroads would then, as now charge "all the traffic would bear" and no more profit would be left to farmers than at present. All over the country it is the same as in Inyo County, railroad men regard farmers as only "d-d peons."

The Sacramento Bee, a strong Republican paper, says there is not a working printer in the United States who will vote for Whitelaw Reid for Vice-President. For years Mr. Reid has been a bitter enemy to working printers. His whole interests and associations are with capitalists, his father-in-law, D. O. Mills being one of them.

If the people of Nevada could have a majority on the bench at the last judgment, it is probable that Satan would be kept busy through eternity dashing ladlefulls of flaming brimstone on the railroad cormorants who never cease to oppress them. Such may be inferred from the newspapers of the State.

Republican newspapers of Colorado and Nevada assert in positive terms that those States will vote against Harrison. In Nevada a large number of Republicans have openly bolted, and are holding meetings in opposition to the ticket.

An Astonished but Considerate Prince.

One of the leading families in Stuttgart gave a supper party to which the prince royal had been invited. His royal highness arrived a little before all the preparations for the feast were completed. Observing that he had arrived a little too soon, he decided to take a short stroll in front of the house while daylight was fading into dark. Suddenly a trim servant maid bounded out of the house and ran up to the prince, to whom she handed a parcel containing, as it afterward turned out, a large piece of sausage and some money, and exclaimed under her breath:

"You won't have to come today; we're having a large party; the prince himself is coming; so goodby till tomorrow!" and with that she gave his royal highness a couple of hearty kisses and disappeared before he had time to get a word out.

A moment later he perceived a soldier in his cloak, who was casting wistful glances at the lighted windows of the house, and asked him if his sweetheart lived there, and on the man's replying in the affirmative the prince continued:

"Then this parcel must be intended for you. The person who brought it sends you word that you are to come tomorrow, for she has no time today on account of the party."

"Much obliged; it's all right, I'll come tomorrow," said the soldier.

"She gave me something besides," the prince went on to say, "but I can't deliver you that."

"Oh, you may keep it and welcome," rejoined the soldier. "I've plenty here for today."

Everybody at the party noticed that his highness was more lively and good humored than usual. He narrated his adventure over the cigars and wine, but exacted a promise that neither the servant girl nor the soldier should suffer in consequence of the disclosure.—Leeds Mercury.

Nickel Armored Ships Can't Go North.

The remarkable discovery of the effect of temperature on the density of nickel steel is likely to have an important bearing on its use in the construction of war vessels. After this variety of steel has been frozen it is readily magnetized, and, moreover, its density is permanently reduced fully 2 per cent. by the exposure to the cold. It is stated that a ship of war built in the temperate climate of ordinary steel and clad with say 3,000 tons of nickel steel armor would be destroyed by a visit to the arctic regions, owing to the contraction of the steel by the extreme low temperature.—New York Journal.

Everybody and his wife will go to Big Pine on the Fourth.

Mr. and Mrs. Burckhardt of Lone Pine were in town on Wednesday.

A second Republican State Convention will be held at Sacramento July 20th.

F. H. Austin and J. G. Dodge of Lone Pine spent several days in town this week.

R. Hessian came down from Big Pine early in the week and spent a day or two in town.

June is certainly the month of brides There were two weddings in town during the week.

Bill Withrow came up from Lone Pine last Tuesday. He will visit Independence for a while.

Supervisor Fitzgerald will be up about the first and will spend the Fourth at Independence.

Miss Seaman, sister of Mrs. J. A. McKenzie, arrived at Lone Pine last Monday on a visit to the latter.

W. H. Russell, of Benton, was in town during the week looking after mining interests in this section.

Mrs. C. W. Craig and son George left on Thursday, a week ago, for San Francisco. They will be absent for several weeks.

Kinsley & Mead's big team passed through town on Tuesday on the way to Mojave. They had a heavy load of back freight.

The Independent Order of Dudes, including Murphy, put in several hours yesterday fixing up the Court House promenade.

A public lecture will be given at Independence on Monday evening by Professor S. P. Putnam, of San Francisco. A cordial invitation is extended to all.

Lafe Gill, Esq., eldest brother of Judge Gill, arrived at Independence on Thursday morning on a visit to his old home. Mr. Gill is located in San Diego County.

For years past C. Mulholland has labored at Los Angeles for the benefit of Inyo county and at last there are indications that his patient and persevering work may result in some good for the people. Capitalists of ample resources are now moving to help us and whatever they may undertake they are abundantly able to carry through.

A report is current about town that the sale of the Soda Works at Keeler to a London corporation has been effected. This is certainly good news, as it means the extension of the works to vastly greater proportions, and consequently the employment of a larger force of men. The amount of the output will only be limited by the facilities for transportation.

The mill moved by Frank Fitzgerald from Wild Rose to Modock was started up on the 20th for a trial run and proved a complete success in every respect. As soon as the necessary wood can be hauled for fuel the mill will be started up for an eight months run on the tailings. On the 28th inst., June Smith will start hauling wood with a sixteen animal team and a good supply will soon be on hand.

The patriotic citizens of Big Pine are hard at work on arrangements for the Fourth of July Celebration. There will be appropriate exercises at Uhlmeyer's Grove at 10 o'clock a. m., concluding with a picnic. In the evening a grand ball will be given at William's pavilion. The people of Big Pine will do all in their power to make the occasion a most pleasurable one for the visitors, and everybody will be cordially welcome.

Chamberlain 'a Colic, Cholera and Diarrhoea Remedy is the standard. Its many cures have won it praise from Maine to California. Every family and every traveler should be provided with it at all times. No other remedy can take its place or do its work. 25 and 50 cent bottles for sale by

FOR PRESIDENT,

GROVER CLEVELAND,

OF NEW YORK.

FOR VICE-PRESIDENT,

GEN. STEVENSON,

OF ILLINOIS.

Grover Cleveland of New York was nominated for President at Chicago on the first ballot, at 4 a. m. yesterday. General Stevenson, of Illinois, was nominated for Vice-President on the first ballot yesterday afternoon. Both nominations were made unanimous.

The Speed Programme.

The people of Independence have responded most liberally to the call for subscriptions toward race purses. There will be the best racing season this Fall ever yet held in the county. A programme has been prepared offering purses aggregating $1075, as follows: Indian Pony Race, 1st horse $15; second, $10. Two-year-olds trotting, mile and repeat, $75. Running, untried horses, ½ mile and repeat, $75, Mile and repeat, trotting, free for all, $200. Two-year-olds, running, ¾ mile dash, $75. Mile and repeat, trotting, 3-minute class. $100. Free for all, running, mile and repeat, $200. Consolation purse, running, ½ mile dash, $75. Stallion trot, 3 in 5, mile heats, $200. Ladies' Tournament, $25, $15, $10. The above is an excellent programme and a number of interesting contests will surely be had, and with the new kite-shaped track, some good records will surely be made.

For the Flyers.

Articles of Incorporation of the Independence Track Association have been prepared and nearly all of the stock subscribed. The Association proposes to buy the necessary land and construct a first class kite-shaped race track that will be a lasting improvement and benefit to the town. It will be fenced, grand stand and judges stand erected, and plenty of good box stalls provided. The track and surroundings will be improved each succeeding year, and that it eventually will become a fast track there can be no doubt. A meeting of the stockholders will be held to-morrow evening to effect a permanent organization.

A Welcome Visitor.

Mr. Fred Eaton of Los Angeles arrived at Independence a few days ago and is carefully looking over the country. Mr. Eaton was formerly City Engineer of Los Angeles and is now engineer of the electric system of street railroads now in operation there. His immediate object is to examine and report upon the feasibility of the much talked of canal to Salt Wells Valley. So far he is well satisfied that the work is quite practicable. If this project goes it will not be the end but only the beginning of the interest that Los Angeles capitalists will take in Inyo county.

In a recent letter to the proprietors, Mr. H. M. Bangs, the druggist at Chatsworth, Ill., says: "I am very much pleased with Chamberlain's Cough Remedy. During the epidemic of la grippe here it took the lead and was very much better liked than other cough medicines." The grip requires precisely the same treatment as a very severe cold, for which this remedy is so efficient. It will promptly loosen a cold and relieve the lungs, soon effecting a cure, while most other medicines in common use for colds only give temporary relief; 50 cent bottles for sale by Miss Grace Littlejohn is a little girl aged eleven years, residing in Baltimore, Ohio. Read what she says: I was troubled with rheumatism for two years, but could get nothing to do him any good. "I was so helpless that I had to be carried like a babe, when I was advised to get a bottle of Chamberlain's Pain Balm. I got it from our druggist, Mr. J. A. Kumbler, and in three days I was up and walking around. I have not felt any return of it since, and my limbs are as limber as they ever were." 50 cent bottles for sale by

AN EXPLANATION AND ANSWER.

WHAT IS WINTERILLA?

Why, it is a pleasant and effective remedy for the positive cure of Chapped Hands, Poison Oak, Salt Rheum, Eczema, Sun Burn, Tan; positively removes Freckles, and is one of the grandest luxuries for gentlemen after shaving. This is an exquisite article prepared with the greatest care by scientific experts. Its component parts are perfectly harmless, and the ladies toilet is not complete without it. One trial will convince the most skeptical that what we say of WINTERILLA is true. For sale by all druggists in 25c and 50c bottles.

I CURE FITS!

When I say cure I do not mean merely to stop them for a time and then have them return again. I mean a radical cure. I have made the disease of FITS, EPILEPSY or FALLING SICKNESS a life-long study. I warrant my remedy to cure the worst cases. Because others have failed is no reason for not now receiving a cure. Send at once for a treatise and a Free Bottle of my infallible remedy. WANTED TO BE OBLIGING.

A Farmer Becomes Disgusted with His Efforts to Accommodate.

"Let me see your Enclycopedia Nux vomica, if you please," said a farmer as he stepped into a prominent book store of Pittsburg.

"Yes, sir," replied the clerk, although he thought the inquirer looked like an unpromising customer.

Still he was polite, for the clerk had general instructions to treat all callers with consideration, and besides this particular clerk had read somewhere of literary men with agricultural habits and of a granger like appearance, and it was barely possible that the man now asking to see the Encyclopedia was one of that kind.

It does not always do to judge people by the clothes they wear, nor to form conclusions from the hayseed which may endeavor to conceal itself cunningly in their hair.

So reasoned this clerk, as he displayed all the twenty-four volumes of the "Encyclopedia Nuxvomica" to the investigating rustic, and expatiated learnedly on the dead loads of erudition which had been consumed in the production of the great work.

The farmer looked slowly and carefully through the volumes, one by one, and listened to what the voluble clerk said, but made no reply or gave any indication of a desire to add the set to his literary possessions. Finally the clerk asked:

"Were you thinking of getting an encyclopedia?"

"Oh no," replied the farmer; "but I like to oblige people."

"Like to oblige people?" exclaimed the astonished clerk.

"Yes. I allers try to oblige people when I can, but sometimes it's mighty inconvenient, in the busy season for instance, like it is now."

"But if you don't intend to buy an encyclopedia," said the clerk, in an injured tone, "why are you wasting your time and mine by looking all through those books?"

"Jist bekase I allers try to oblige, sir, even at some inconvenience to myself."

"I don't see how you are obliging anybody," added the clerk, as he sadly replaced the books in their box, and wondered if he had better call the police.

"Don't you?" asked the granger. "Well, I'll tell you. You hev a sign in the winder which says, 'Ask to see our Encyclopedia Nuxvomica,' an' as I allers try to oblige I come in an' dun as the sign said, but there be some people as never appreciate it when you do try to oblige 'em."

And the farmer walked out, resolving never to try to oblige the city people again.—Pittsburg Chronicle-Telegraph.

A Nation With Many Holidays.

It was reserved for the new republic of Brazil to institute the most extensive and remarkable series of national holidays ever known.

The provisional government of that country has issued a decree which declares that, "inasmuch as the republican system is founded upon a profound sentiment of universal brotherhood," and as "this sentiment cannot be properly developed without a system of public festivals destined to commemorate the continuity and solidarity of all generations of man," it has seen fit to institute a series of holidays which will commemorate the points of union between the history of Brazil and that of all peoples.

The government, consequently, establishes nine national holidays. The 1st of January is to be devoted to the commemoration of universal brotherhood, the 21st of April to the events which were the precursors of Brazilian independence and the 3d of May to the discovery of Brazil.

The 13th of May also becomes a holiday and is to "commemorate the brotherhood of all Brazilians." The 14th of June "commemorates the republic, and the liberty and independence of the American peoples." The 7th of September is to honor the independence of Brazil, the 12th of October the discovery of America, the 2d of November the memory of the dead, and the 15th of November the glory of the country of Brazil in general.—Youth's Companion.

Two Answers.

"What made you tell her so many times?" asked a sympathizing bystander, who had heard a railway official answer the same question for an old lady six times in fifteen minutes.

"Why, she didn't understand!" replied he simply, evidently a little surprised at the suggestion that he could have refrained from speaking. In disagreeable contrast to his forbearance stands the speech of the sea captain, irritated by an oft repeated query.

"Is it always foggy off the banks?" asked a passenger, guiltless of a suspicion that he might offend.

"How do I know, sir?" snarled the captain. "I'm not always off the banks."—Youth's Companion.

She Was Mistaken.

"Maria," said Mr. Jones, looking tenderly at his wife, "there is a mous"——

"Oh, mercy goodness, where? Oh, save me. Jeptha, save me—save your Maria!" and the frightened woman jumped on the sofa and screamed hysterically.

"Good heavens, Maria, what is the matter? I don't see anything! Where is it?"

"You said there was a mouse!"

"I didn't say anything of the kind. I said, or tried to say, there was a mousselin delaine dress in Brown's window which was exactly like one you had when we were married. I wish you wouldn't interrupt me like that."—Detroit Free Press.

To Prevent Counterfeiting.

It is curious to observe at this day the complicated geometrical patterns in which some of the ancient Roman seals are designed, unmistakably for the purpose of defeating the ingenious counterfeiter, as the engravers at the bureau of engraving and printing try by similar means to multiply the forger's difficulties. The usefulness of this art is shown by the fact that the coins of the civilized world are cameos multiplied to any extent by dies.—Jewelers' Weekly.

WE DON'T ALL SMOKE HAVANAS.

The Number of People in the Country Who Smoke Imported Cigars.

"As near as we can get at it," said the cigar dealer, "we calculate that there are 13,000,000 smokers in the United States. We haven't been able to get it down fine enough yet to estimate how many of these smoke cigars, what proportion the pipe, or the number of those who inhale the delusive cigarette, but we can get pretty close to the number who go in for imported cigars. And that number surprised me when I figured it out. Not one person in a thousand would be able to guess anywhere near it, after knowing the total number of smokers in the country. Now out of those 13,000,000 smokers how many indulge in Havanas?"

"About 4,000,000," replied the reporter.

"That's the nearest to the number of any guess I've had, and I have a standing offer of a box of the best Perfectos to the man who guesses within half a million of the actual figure. I'm sorry, but near as you came you have not won the box. You're out of the way, though, only about 4,000,000 in your guess. Now, then, if you'll tell me whether you are too high or too low I'll give you the Perfectos."

"Too low, of course."

"Exactly. That's what they all think. I'm sorry, young man, but you don't get the box. You're just 3,234,000 smokers too high in your estimate. Hardly believe it, would you? Nobody would. But it's so, and there's no getting around it. Why, if there were 4,000,000 consumers of Havana cigars in this country, how often do you suppose each one would get a Havana to smoke? Just about three a month. That is, if all the cigars imported from Cuba into the United States were equally divided among 4,000,000 smokers, each smoker would have twenty-five cigars and a piece of one. At the outside we take from Cuba 110,000,000 cigars a year. That is all the demand calls for. Consequently we smoke in round numbers 330,000 of them every day.

"I think it is fair to give five cigars as each smoker's daily average. So we see by easy figuring that just 66,000 persons are all that are required to get away with all the imported cigars that the United States consumes annually. Astonishing, isn't it? Out of an army of 13,000,000 people in this country who smoke only 66,000 indulge in the luxury of imported cigars, but that 66,000 pay not less than an average of $1 apiece every day for the privilege, which makes the snug little sum of $22,000,000 a year which goes up in the fragrant smoke of the Havana in this great and glorious land."—New York Sun.

Truth in a Fable.

A story hailing from the orient is to the effect that one day as a pious mollah was riding into Smyrna on a donkey he met the Cholera specter, who told him that he was going into the city by command of Allah to kill 700 faithful. The mollah invited him to ride on his donkey, and as they neared the gates the holy man said, "I conjure you, in the name of Allah, and by the pure faith of a Moslem, that thou wilt not slay one more than the Lord has commanded."

The Cholera took the oath, alighted from the donkey and at once set about his commission of slaughter. Instead of 700, however, 7,000 of the faithful died during the period of the Cholera's visitation.

When the Cholera had finished his appointed work and was about to depart from Smyrna the mollah again met him. "How is it?" demanded he, "that thou hast committed so great a perjury, and violated thy oath to Allah that thou wouldst not slay more than 700?" "I have slain the 700," answered the Cholera, "neither more nor less. All the others have been slain by panic, and not by me, blessed be Allah!"—Chicago Herald.

He Waited in Line.

A delegation came from Chicopee and Chicopee Falls one Saturday night to attend George Kennan's lecture. Most of them had already purchased tickets, but one sorry mortal from the Falls had gone unprovided; so on coming into the lower city hall he beheld a long serpentine line of people, and promptly falling into line he patiently waited for his turn. He thought the tickets were being sold rather slowly, but not until he was pretty near the head of the line did he discover that the people were paying their tax bills. The doctor was made to feel very tired while going home on the cars that night, but he knows now where the tax collector's office is.—Springfield Homestead.

FINDING THE PROOF.

HOW AN EDITOR CONVINCED A FINANCIER.

A Doubter Is Given Unquestionable Proof Which He Did Not Believe Could Be Produced.

"It is all very well," said a prominent California street financier to a well-known San Francisco editor, "for you newspaper men to investigate and recommend anything which can help the people, but the proofs you bring are not definite enough and are too far away from home. Why don't you produce some San Francisco proofs? Simply because you cannot do it."

"I will wager you the best dinner you can order," said the editor, "that within a week I can produce confirmatory evidence right here in San Francisco that every assertion we have made concerning this investigation is true."

The results of the editorial work are given herewith:

Mr. William Giselman, a well-known attorney and manager of the Hasting's Trust, was found at his office in the Phelan Building. When asked if he had been benefited by the use of Warner's Safe Cure he cheerfully and enthusiastically told what the remedy had done for him.

"I had possessed strong prejudice against patent medicines," he said, "but four years ago when I was suffering from a severe attack of congestion of the kidneys and liver, I was persuaded to try Warner's Safe Cure. I was surprised at the almost immediate benefit I derived from it and I have been an enthusiastic friend of the medicine ever since. I have recommended it to a great many friends, not only in this city but in Sacramento and in Solano and Napa counties, and always with the best results following its use."

Dr. M. M. Gibson is the pastor of the United Presbyterian Church. Some years ago, while traveling in Europe, he contracted renal calculus, or stone in the kidneys. He tried various remedies but got no permanent relief. Speaking of the way he finally became cured, the Doctor said:

"Having heard of Warner's Safe Cure I wrote to the proprietors at Rochester, New York, and they, through professional courtesy, sent me a half dozen bottles. I took the medicine according to the directions and was speedily restored to health. Since then I have had no return of the trouble from which I suffered so intensely. I have heard many people tell of the benefits derived from the use of this great remedy. Only the other day I was talking to Mr. Seabury, the druggist, opposite the Baldwin, on Market street. He was decrying patent medicines, when I said: 'How about Warner's?' He replied: 'That remedy is not properly classed as a patent medicine. It was originally a physician's prescription.'"

Mr. J. J. Evans, the popular stationer at 406 California street, said:

"For years I had been troubled with rheumatism which seemed to settle in my shoulders, giving me most intense pain. I tried various remedies and doctors' prescriptions, but could get no permanent relief. A few bottles of Warner's Safe Cure perfectly restored me to health and I am no longer a sufferer from rheumatism."

Mr. C. W. Hopkins, with J. Houston & Co., Market street, in reply to the inquiry of our reporter, said:

"In 1884 I was refused a policy in the Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York, on account of kidney trouble, which soon after became so severe that I was compelled to take to my bed. I employed the best physicians who diagnosed my trouble as a case of Bright's Disease and pronounced it incurable, giving me but a year to live. My sufferings were terrible and reduced me to almost a skeleton. After spending over $1300 in doctors' bills, without obtaining either health or encouragement, I was induced to try Warner's Safe Cure. I did so, and was surprised and rejoiced to find that it was working a radical cure which has long since been effected. As a result of the work of this great remedy, I to-day carry a policy in the above-mentioned Life Insurance Company and consider myself as healthy a man as can be found in this particularly healthy country."

Dr. H. M. Fiske, whose office is in the Donohue Building, is one of the oldest and best known physicians in the city. In the course of conversation our reporter frankly asked the Doctor if in his practice he had any experience with the use of Warner's Safe Cure. The physician answered the inquiry with more candor than most doctors would display when proprietary medicines are mentioned. He said:

"I have seen the formula published in the Medical Journals and I should judge that it had been prepared by some able physician. I experimented with the prescription by prescribing medicine under similar formulæ and found that they did much good. In one or two cases after that where circumstances made it difficult for patients to reach me for treatment, I advised them to go and get Warner's Safe Cure. I do not care to say much about the remedy except that I have found it a very good preparation. One case in which I know of its successful use was that of Bright's Disease in its earlier stages."

It is needless to say that these overwhelming proofs convinced the financier, as they should any reasonable person, that the great preparation of which they speak has no equal for the serious troubles it is designed to cure. Its wonderful popularity is due wholly to its power and it stands, as it deserves to stand, above all other modern cures.—San Francisco Evening Post.

Lovers in Mackinac.

Mackinac is a perfect heaven for lovers. The Grand hotel has its front all dotted with little balconies, one to every other window and each strongly suggestive of the prettiest scene in "Romeo and Juliet." On a distant balcony I have seen a lovely girl appear to hold a long whispered conversation with her beau three times after leaving him for the night below stairs—once when she reached her room, again when she thought of another thing to say before disrobing, and yet again in her wrapper after she had made herself otherwise ready for bed. And at that time there were other lovers talking from one balcony to another, others in the grove in front of the great hotel, others on the board walks leading to the village, and still others, I doubt not, everywhere that the moon shone and the breezes fanned the island.—Julian Ralph in New York Sun.

A Novel Preventive of Sore Throat.

People who are subject to inconvenient throat trouble, caused by a proneness to catch cold on slight exposure, are advised to place a few threads of Berlin wool around the neck and wear them continuously. From ten to twenty threads are enough for the purpose. They should only be removed while making ablutions, and should be left off gradually by discarding daily one thread at a time. The remedy probably acts by keeping up a belt of skin action, thus acting mildly and continuously as a slight counter-irritant.

Ancient History.

A reporter amused himself one national holiday by quizzing "a regular Fourth of July darkey" about the origin of the day. The negro was an old man, a sage among his people. He wore the regulation black suit, second hand and faded, while his head was adorned with a broken down beaver hat that had done service "before the war."

After some preliminary conversation the reporter asked, "Do you know what the Fourth of July is?"

"Who, me? In course I does. Hit's de openin' ob de watermillion season, an' de folks lays off a day ter git a good taste."

"Why do the colored people celebrate?"

"'Cause de white folks does."

"Well, why did the white folks first start it?"

"Well, dat was 'fore my time. You gwine back too fur fur me, boss. But I'se hear 'em tell about it."

"How was it?"

"Well, ef I'se up on de Bible hit wuz 'bout de time Moses wuz 'lected de fust president er dese United States."

"No; you are a little off there; it wasn't Moses."

"Well, what wuz de gemmen's name?"

"Don't you know it?"

"Course I knows it; but I can't 'member de name right now."

"Was it Abe Lincoln?"

"Yas, ser, he de man. My grandpa wuz wid him when he rid across de Chattahooche riber in de batteau, an' grandpa catched de bigges' catfish dat Mister Linkun eber seed, an' he gib him a silver dollar fur hit, an' my ole lady's got de dollar now. Yas, ser, dat's de reason dey celebrates de Fofe."—Atlanta Journal.

St. Peter's Handwriting.

The papyrus manuscript found in the old hermit's den in a cave near Jerusalem in 1880, and said to be the work of St. Peter, has been submitted to a committee sent out by the Biblical society of London, who have come to the conclusion that the manuscript is in reality in the handwriting of the great apostle. They have refused a $100,000 offer for the document, which was made by a British society of literary voluptuaries. The Hebrew Bible in the Vatican and the manuscript copy of the Book of Mormon are the only other documents for which so high a price has been offered and refused.—St. Louis Republic.

When Was Christ Born?

We have no proof that Dec. 25 is the date of the birth of Christ. At one time the beginning of the Christian era was supposed to conform with the date above mentioned, and for that reason was called Christmas by all Christian nations. It is now generally conceded by the best authorities of the world, too, that Christ was not born on Dec. 25 or any other time during the winter. The date now unanimously agreed upon is April 5, not April 5 of the "year of 1," but April 5, B. C. 4. This error in our mode of reckoning time is supposed to have arisen from the fact that the dating of time as "A. D." was not introduced, into the church at least, until about the year 527 A. D.—St. Louis Republic.

NEVER TRAVEL WITHOUT THEM.

Persons should never travel without a box of BRANDRETH'S PILLS. A few doses taken before going on ship will prevent sea sickness, and one pill every night on shipboard will counteract the costive action of the sea air. When sick, troubled with pains, colds, or dizziness, or having rheumatism take from three to five pills and if they do not operate in an hour or so take three or four more.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS are purely vegetable, absolutely harmless, and safe to take at any time.

Sold in every drug and medicine store, either plain or sugar coated.

"How do I look?"

That depends, madam, upon how you feel. If you're suffering from functional disturbances, irregularities or weaknesses, you're sure to "look it." And Dr Pierce's Favorite Prescription is the remedy. It builds up and invigorates the system, regulates and promotes the proper functions, and restores health and strength. It's a legitimate medicine, not a beverage; purely vegetable, perfectly harmless, and made especially for woman's needs. In the cure of all "female complaints," it's guaranteed to give satisfaction, or the money is refunded. No other medicine for women is sold so. Think of that, when the dealer says something else (which pays him better) is "just as good."

"Times have changed." So have methods. The modern improvements in pills are Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Pellets. They help Nature, instead of fighting with her. Sick and nervous headache, biliousness, costiveness, and all derangements of the liver, stomach and bowels are prevented, relieved, and cured.

IN THE NICK OF TIME.

The nick of time to stop the course of bladder and kidney complaints is when the organs concerned exhibit a tendency to grow inactive. The healthful impulse toward activity that they receive from Hostetter's Stomach Bitters rescues them from impending danger, and averts such dangerous maladies as Bright's disease and diabetes. Sluggishness of the kidneys increases a liability to chronic rheumatism, gout and dropsy, and since the blood is filtered by these organs in its passage through them, the operation of the Bitters serves a doubly happy purpose. The medicine acts without exciting, like the fiery stimulants of commerce. Malarial, dyspeptic, constipated and nervous invalids are thoroughly relieved by it. Since the advent of that shocking malady, la grippe, it has been widely demonstrating its usefulness as a curative and preventive of it.

An Indiana woman claims to have worn a corset for seventy years. A rather protracted stay.

DEAFNESS CAN'T BE CURED

by local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube gets inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed Deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

We will give One Hundred Dollars for any case of Deafness (caused by Catarrh) that we can not cure by taking Hall's Catarrh Cure. Send for circulars, free.

PRAYER, WORK AND PLAY.

Arduous Daily Routine in Catholic Colleges.

SEVERE COURSE OF STUDY AND TRAINING

Unflagging Zeal Necessary to Enter the Priesthood.—The Routine.

What kind of a life is it in our colleges? Well, I suppose it is much the same as the life in colleges which are not ecclesiastical. Of course, church students have many more prayers to say, and are expected to observe the rules with more fidelity than other students.

They rise early—in foreign colleges at 5 in winter and 6 in summer—in most English colleges at 6 all the year round. Half an hour is allowed for dressing, after which all go down in silence to the church, where morning prayers are said, and a meditation is held for half an hour on some spiritual subject. Meditation is followed immediately by the celebration of mass, and altogether about an hour is spent every morning in spiritual exercises. Then follows study till breakfast time, at 8.

Breakfast consists of a bowl of coffee or tea, with bread and butter at discretion in the home colleges, while abroad one has a choice between coffee, milk and chocolate, but the bread must be eaten dry. It is wonderful what a substantial meal can be made of coffee and dry bread when there is nothing else to be had. A few minutes for recreation are allowed after breakfast, then work goes on till dinner time, broken only by half an hour's recreation at 11 o'clock.

PLAIN FARE.

Dinner, which is eaten at 1, is always a good, substantial meal, and ample justice is done to it after the rather thin breakfast. No study is allowed during the hour and a half following dinner. All who are well enough must join in the public games, which for the most part are played with great spirit and keenly enjoyed.

At 3 o'clock the studies commence again, and class and lecture or preparation for them, with half an hour's rest at 5, go on until 7 or half past, when thirty minutes are given to prayer and the reading of the life of some saint. After the prayers all go to the refectory for supper, which, like dinner, is eaten in silence, broken only by the voice of the reader, who reads aloud some biographical or historical work.

After supper there is recreation, and at foreign colleges this is always the favorite hour of the day. And very pleasant it is to hear the fresh young voices and merry hearted laughter echoing along the college cloisters.

At 9 the big bell rings out again for the last time that day, and at its first peal the talk and laugh are hushed, the groups break up, all—professors and church students alike—make their way to the church for night prayers. Prayers over the points for the next morning's meditations are read out, and after the singing of a hymn all retire to a well earned rest, which in most cases is only too soon disturbed by the noisy clanging of the great bell in the early morning.

Of course, every day is not a study day. Sunday is always, more or less, a day of rest, and at least one afternoon every week is devoted to outdoor recreation.

Yet, in spite of occasional play days, as they are called, and the holidays twice a year, the life is hard enough. It must necessarily go on for some dozen years before the student is called up for ordination. The life of a Catholic priest is indeed one to which many are called, but few are chosen. A great number of those who go to college, at the age of fourteen or fifteen, with the intention of becoming priests, do not reach the goal of ordination.

In some cases health breaks down, many grow weary of the routine and strict discipline of the life, others discover that they have no calling for the ecclesiastical state, and go out into the world to begin life afresh. So, from one cause or another, the student finds that by the time he is ready for ordination he has lost the company of many who stood by his side when he entered college.

Of six who went to college some seventeen years ago with the present writer, one is dead, one is practicing as a doctor in the United States, a third is manager of a bank in the north of England, another is serving as a mounted policeman in South Africa, and only two are priests.—A Catholic Priest in London Tit-Bits.

No Animals in the Dry Parts of Caves.

No animals whatever are found in the dry parts of caves. Dampness, or a certain degree of moisture, seems to be essential to their existence. Under the stones one finds white, eyeless worms, and in the damp soil around about are to be discovered blind beetles in little holes which they excavate and bugs of the thousand-leg sort. These thousand-leg bugs, which in the upper world devour fragments of dead leaves and other vegetable debris, sustain life in the caverns by feeding upon decayed wood, fungus growths and bats' dung. Kneeling in a beaten path one can see numbers of them gathered about hardened drips of tallow from tourists' candles. There are plenty of crickets also.—Washington Star.

Queer Religious Sects in Russia.

M. Tsakni, a Russian writer, has published an interesting work upon the curious religious sects of Russia, from which it appears that there are not less than 15,000,000 followers of insane and cranky notions in that empire. These communities of devout and deluded Christians are constantly springing up in spite of all the efforts of Russian despots to keep them down.—St. Louis Republic.

TRIALS ON A STREET CAR.

A Conductor's Version Not Agreed With by a Woman Who Interrupts His Wail.

A conductor on an Eighth avenue car going up town one evening when the cold weather was recently here wore a smile so pronounced that no one could resist asking him the cause of his jubilant spirits.

"Why," said he, as he pulled the strap to let a woman with a big basket get off the car, "I've had nothing but a picnic all day. I started out this morning with an open car, but after the first trip most of the open cars were recalled and closed cars substituted. I've had a closed car all day."

"Do you much prefer a closed car?" he was asked.

"Well, rather. Say, it's nothin' but fun to run one of these cars 'longside of one of those big carryalls for a couple of months," remarked the collector of fares as he became so much interested in his conversation that he failed to hear a stout man calling frantically for him to stop the car.

"Here, you see, I have only a nice little select crowd to look after, and I can see every motion or signal that is made, while on one of the open cars I must be on the lookout constantly for some one who wishes to get on or off the car, and I must bounce off about every minute to help a woman on, and a woman never knows where she wishes to sit, and usually walks the whole length of the car before making up her mind that she desires the vacant seat furthest from her. In fact," he continued, growing confidential, "women cause me all the annoyance I have on the road. They have more little tricks to bother a conductor with than any one can imagine. Now, in the first place, if they have a mutilated coin in their pocketbook the conductor is sure to get it. May as well take it and say nothin'. We are sure to get it some way.

"Another common occurrence is when a woman has three or four pennies in her purse and a $5 or $10 bill. She will hold the pennies in one hand and the bill in the other for the conductor to take his choice—the pennies or change the bill. Another pleasant little pastime which a number of the women patrons of this line have is to pay their fare with five pennies and manage to drop two or three of them on the floor in handing them to the conductor. They seem to enjoy seeing us try to fish the money out of the slats which cover the floor of the car. If a man has an idea of getting married he should work on this railroad for a while, and I think he would get so discouraged with women that he would be glad to remain"——

"Why didn't you stop the car at Twenty-ninth street, as I asked you?" demanded a woman with blazing eyes and voice quivering with rage at this juncture. "Do you think I want to walk the whole length of the city? I'll take your number and have you discharged to-morrow, you careless, heedless fellow," she said, as she swept off the car.

"See there, that is what I have to put up with all the time. Just because I carried that woman a couple of blocks too far she abuses me like a pickpocket," sighed the conductor with an injured air, as he went into the car to ask a man to stop smoking.—New York Tribune.

How Skunks Are Caught.

You fasten a piece of meat to a stout piece of cord and let it hang over the fence. Pretty soon an animal comes along and sniffs the meat. "Fe, fa, fo, fum; I smell the blood of an Englishman," says the little ogre, and straightway fastens his teeth in the meat. Now straightway lift him up. He will not drop for full a minute. If you have a bag handy drop him into it. And Mr. Clark says that you can safely put half a dozen in together, throw the bag over your shoulder and march off with them.

Another way permitted by the insurance companies for handling the animal is to lift it up by the tail. It will do you no harm. But let it once catch your eagle eye then look out for trouble. There is a whitey spot on the face of every skunk, and that is the danger signal.

"When you see the whites of the British eyes fire!" said old Put, at Bunker Hill.

"When you see the whites of the polecat's face then run," say I. It is a very safe experiment.—Cor. New York Herald.

What a Shanghai Eats.

J. S. Richey walked into our office the other morning and gravely deposited on our table a kingbolt belonging to a wagon, a log chain link, a bar of steel ten inches long and a large clevis, all of which he stated he took out of the craw of a Shanghai rooster, which he had killed Sunday morning for dinner, because he expected his pastor to dine with him on that occasion. The gentleman stated that it was supposed the said rooster had devoured an immigrant wagon some time in his life, and digested all of it but the samples shown, which, being steel, were too hard for him. This seems a pretty hard story, and if Mr. Richey was not a very truthful gentleman we wouldn't believe it.—Exchange.

He Was Out.

"This pitcher is over a hundred years old, and belonged to my grandmother's days," said Miss Antique.

"Ah," responded Sportbee, with the first interest he had shown in the bric-a-brac room, "I didn't know they played baseball then. Were you fond of the game?"—Detroit Free Press.

PRACTICAL FISHING.

"Gangs" With Which Fisherman Work Effectively.

DEVICES USED FOR KILLING BIG FISH.

The Various Kinds of Tackle Used in Deep Water Fishing.

For the practical angler who goes fishing to catch fish and not with the idea that the fish must have the biggest possible chance to get away and the angler the least possible chance to capture his prey, "gangs of hooks" are used and are coming more into use every day. Their use is justified by the consideration that the ocean and the large lakes comprise a large territory, and that fish are comparatively difficult to take, so that the wise angler multiplies his chances of a catch by multiplying the number of his hooks. In gang fishing the hooks must be as widely separated as possible in order that the bait may be swung around and cover as much space in the water as possible and attract the notice of the fish.

Gangs are used in both salt and fresh water fishing. In salt water fishing they are called "separaters," because the hooks are kept as far apart as possible. In fresh water fishing two styles are used, minnow gangs and gangs of flies. Minnow gangs are in use in angling for trout, black bass, pike and pickerel. If the reader should chance to enter the manufactory of a gang-maker with the notion of making a gang for himself he would see something like this: The expert determines first whether the minnow gang is to be made up of hooks bound on gimp or on gut. If on gut it must be either on single or double gut, the single gut being intended for trout or small black bass and double gut for large black bass. English white silkheart gimp is used for pike and pickerel, though some anglers choose treble twisted gut.

HOW TO MAKE A GANG.

The expert takes the end of the gut or gimp between the thumb and fingers of his left hand, and with his right hand arranges three hooks at the end of the line. When they are placed at equal distances apart, so that the points of the hooks form a triangle, he binds them firmly to the line with waxed silk, first laying the end of the silk along the shanks of the hooks, and then winding the silk over and over after the fashion of a thread on a spool. After securing the end of the thread by a peculiar twist known to anglers the artisan measures off an inch or so of the line and binds on three more hooks in a similar way. Afterward he measures off an inch more and fastens a single hook on the gut. This hook is called the lip hook. It is so called because it is placed on the gut above the gang, and the minnow is hooked to it through the lip. The whippings are finally coated with varnish, and the gang is ready to use after fastening a swivel at the end of the gut.

The Seth Green gang, so named from the inventor, or at least, as that is disputed, the great advocate of artificial propagation of fish, is the simplest of gangs, being made of two treble hooks, one lip hook and a gut from six inches to a foot long, with a swivel. It is used for brook trout or small black bass, and it costs twenty-five cents at tackle stores. For black bass fishing, where the fish run large, it is customary to use two or three treble hooks and a lip hook, with a very stout gut about three feet long. They cost from thirty to fifty cents. For large black bass, lake trout or pickerel fishing some fishermen prefer a minnow gang with a patent treble hook baiting needle, bound in either a heavy single or double gut. They can be used for trolling or still fishing.

MANY KINDS OF TACKLE.

Finally, where fish run very large, two or three treble hooks and lip hook are used on treble twisted gut or silver gimp from one to three feet long. They cost from 30 to 50 cents each. Undoubtedly this is the most popular gang used for trolling among the Thousand Islands, and for that reason it is termed the "St. Lawrence gang." It is highly esteemed because on it a minnow lives longer than on any other gang, and because it is the easiest gang on which a minnow can be placed. Furthermore, it does not scare away the old and wary fellows by a dangling line of hooks in the rear. Some anglers use three swivels on the end of the gimp, and this course prevents kinking and breaking of the gimp and the loss of the fish.

In trolling for black bass, perch, rock bass and pike perch a deadly gang is composed of a nine foot single or double gut leader and four flies known as Seth Green's favorites. For the tail or stretcher fly a "Seth Green" is used, for the first dropper a "Governor Alvord," for the second dropper a "Grizzly King" and for the upper dropper a "Lake George." For the "Lake George" dropper a live minnow is often used with a "Seth Green gang."

In salt water fishing a gang once very popular has long since been discarded by many anglers on account of its bungling construction. It consisted of two pieces of brass wire bent to form nearly a quadrant of a circle. These wires were fastened together in such a way that when in use they were pulled out to form nearly a half circle. The other ends were formed into loops, and from each end a gut or gimp leader was suspended, the leader being long or short according to the depth of the water. It was suspended from the center, and swivel was constructed in the top so that the apparatus could revolve when a fish took the hook on one of the lines. From the center below was suspended a lead sinker. This gang was superseded by a lighter invention. With the big sinker, furthermore, the waves frolicked, and it was not certain whether the fisherman had a fish or not, and the bobbing of the line was often due to the sinker.

One of the most popular weakfish gangs was adopted from a gang sometimes used in black bass fishing, and differs from it only in having a float painted red floating on the water. Its simplicity is its great merit. The fishing line is passed through two eyes of a three armed swivel. Then a snell is fastened to the third eye, the snell being divided at its further end into two arms. One arm is short and one long, so that both hooks will not come together.—New York Times.

Vibrations in Buildings.

The danger and inconvenience resulting from the vibrations in buildings caused by running machinery can be to a large degree removed by increasing the speed of the engine, the idea being to set up a discordant vibration between the engine and the floor beam. The Pittsburg Dispatch tells of a ten horse power engine which, on the upper story of a silverware manufactory, created such a commotion as to rattle the silverware on the shelves a hundred feet distant. A change of twenty-five revolutions in the speed, which was in the direction of increasing the speed, entirely stopped the vibrations.

Powey.

The above is a true copy taken from the original by Ephraim Morton, now, if not recently deceased, living at Washington, Pa. When Mr. Morton was a young man he acted as a clerk in the Pennsylvania land office. One day while looking over some of the oldest records in the office he accidentally discovered the above deed, and considering it an historical curiosity, made a copy of it for his own use.

Only two of the "Indian kings" signed in full, Packenah and Econus; each of the others signed with a mark, as did also each of the witnesses.—St. Louis Republic.

A Calculating Man.

Civil engineers are mostly commonplace people, but an odd stick occasionally turns up among them. One of the oddest I ever met lives here in St. Louis. He is an old man, thoroughly educated in his business, and a paragon of exactness, even for a mathematician. Not many months ago he was called to East St. Louis to make a new survey of an old line, originally run by himself. On the first survey he had driven a certain corner stake deep in the ground and covered it up with a large stone. When he came to the spot he got a spade and cleaned the soil from around the stone, and then cleaned it off nicely with some dry leaves, top and sides.

Next he took out his rule and made careful measurements of the stone, which he used a moment later on the basis of a calculation to determine its weight. When he saw the product his face lightened up with joy, for the numbers of pounds, ounces and drams represented therein was within the limit of his lifting power. He made no attempt to lift the stone as a means of testing his ability to handle it, but relied on his mathematical knowledge to settle that point for him. This is the only case I ever knew of where a man demonstrated his own lifting power by the use of arithmetic.—St. Louis Globe Democrat.

The Effects of Cycling.

The effect of cycling on the upper extremity of the arm and forearm is to slightly bend the limb, the deformity taking place in the arm bone and in the fingers, and to bring about an unnatural curve of the shoulders. On the lower limbs cycling tells as markedly as it does on the spine, and, as the lower limbs perform the greater part of the work, they usually feel the effects of it most distinctly. Riding brings out and exaggerates any deformity, however slight. The pelvis of the rider, now practically a part of the machine, is fixed to it, and is almost as rigid as itself. In this position of things the thigh bone is placed under unusual strain. The large muscles in the fore part of the thigh are employed in extending or lifting up the leg at great disadvantage of leverage. What the strain is on these muscles every young cyclist knows to his cost, and it is not until they get a kind of extra natural power that riding is easy.—Dr. B. W. Richardson in Asclepiad.

Church Bells in Chicago.

There are more church bells on the west side than in any of the other divisions. There are fewer on the north side. The west side churchgoer inherits the habit of his grandfather, who never started for church until he heard the first bell ring, no matter if his watch or clock indicated that the sexton was wrong. There are few church bells sold in Chicago now. The new style of church architecture in the city doesn't include the spire or cupola except for ornamental purposes, and the ultra style of church architecture does not have any at all.

In the good old days the man who rang the church bell was a character. But there isn't much to the ringer of today that makes him known to any one except the vestry who fixes his pay.—Chicago Tribune.

The Science of Physiology.

The study of physiology in common schools has its undoubted advantages, but some of the answers on examination days, when teacher and pupils are alike anxious, throw a lurid light on the path of science. Johnny, a member of a school with which I am familiar, had replied with much courage and some accuracy to inquiries about various portions of the human frame. At last the overhopeful teacher propounded this apparently innocent question: "How long is the esophagus, Johnny?" With no hesitation and with a measuring glance of the eye Johnny answered loudly: "Twenty-eight feet!"—Christian Union.

An Old Adage Knocked Out.

The late Richard Beebe, of West Springfield, once attempted to refute the saying, "You can't make a whistle out of a pig's tail," and not only made one, but two whistles, which, although seventy-eight years old, still make a respectable noise. George A. Hill has these curious relics, and the pigskin has become so hard that it requires moistening to make the music mellow.—Springfield Republican.

Gen. Alger at the close of the war landed in Detroit without a cent, and had to borrow money to pay his board bill. At present he owns two hundred square miles of pine land in Michigan and is reputed to be worth $20,000,000.

ART IN FACE MAKEUP.

Henry Irving Explains the Most Effective Methods.

SIMPLE LINES PRODUCE GREAT EFFECTS.

A Chat in the Dressing Room.—Materials and Colors.

To gain an interview with Henry Irving requires a good deal of patience. However, one morning I met him by chance as he was coming from the theater. I introduced myself and quickly delivered my petition, asking him to allow me to be present some evening in his dressing room while he was making up. I was convinced that an actor like Irving could teach me more of the art of making up in one hour than I was able to pick up in months of practical experience. I made my request so urgent that he could not refuse it, the more so as he seemed to be in a great hurry and anxious to get rid of me.

A few evenings later the stout janitor growlingly let me enter. The day before I had sent an appropriate present to his master, including a note reminding him of his promise.

At that time a revival of the "Merchant of Venice" was the attraction at the Lyceum.

Entering the dressing room with its mirrors, wardrobes, screens and toilet tables, on which wool, wigs, powder boxes, bottles of all sizes and sticks of grease paint were lying in great disorder, I found the actor already dressed for his part, but his face was not yet made up. He nodded to me and beckoned his dresser, a mere boy, to proceed in his work.

"No set rules can be laid down for making up faces," began Irving, seated comfortably in an arm chair. "A painter might as well try to give to his pupils in a few set rules the drawing of a Raphael or the coloring of a Titian. Every Thespian must study these things for himself, as they cannot be taught. The ordinary textbooks are valueless, nevertheless, I might be able to give you a few valuable hints."

In the meantime the little dresser had combed the Shylock wig, and now handed it to Irving, who seized it at the temples and drew it down on his head, and then holding one hand on the part so as not to remove it again, pulled the "poll" of the wig downward with the other hand. This is the only right way to put on a wig.

"The object of making up is not to mask the face, but to aid and emphasize its expression. This is the most important point in our art and should never be lost sight of," he resumed, undergoing the unpleasant procedure of having his entire face be smeared with cold cream and then carefully wiped off with a towel.

"The best materials for beards is soft, raw wool, like this," and he seized a small lump of dark brown and mixed it with a lighter shade, "not put up in braids as very often sold at the wigmakers. Good wool if pulled should not tear, even if drawn in long strips to the thinness of a spider's web." Holding the wool in the left hand he modeled it with the right until it had the desired shape of a goatee and slight mustache. Then the boy dipped a piece of white glue into water, held it over the gaslight and applied it to Irving's chin and upper lip.

"Only a few dots," Irving advised, "they are sufficient to attach a beard." The extreme thinness, which allowed the skin to shine through, added vastly to its natural appearance.

"And now the brows," ejaculated Irving.

"False brows?" I inquired doubtfully.

"They are as easily put on as postage stamps on a letter," the little dresser allowed himself to remark. "You simply daub them with a little spirit gum and slap them in place."

"Hush," said his master, with a faint smile. "To show you how far the change of a single feature of a face can alter its expression let us consider the eyes; they will do as well as any other part."

And he suggested a few methods of disguises. To make an eye look obliquely a short line with brown running down at the outside and up at the inside corner of the eye is drawn. To enlarge an eye a brown line is drawn along the upper eyelid. To counterfeit eyes that have been weeping rose color is used, for the expression of grief light gray (antimony). Eyebrows that begin near the root of the nose and slant upward impart the cunning, diabolical expression of Mephistopheles. A strong black dot at the inside corner of the eye heightens this effect. The eye of a madman is represented by a red line under the eye, also by reddening the space between the upper eyelid and brow.

Sternness, such as is desirable in Shylock, may be acquired instantly in drawing two vertical lines between the eyes. By far the best advice was that the color of the brow should always be darker than that of the hair, and the color of the hair darker than that of the beard or mustache.

He had now come to the drawing of wrinkles. The two between the eyebrows, as mentioned above, and two from the nostrils to the corners of the mouth were necessary. To counterpart exactly a natural wrinkle he first drew sharp lines with a brown pencil, then rubbed it into the complexion, powdered it with a miniature puff and labored on it until it looked more like a shadow than a line.

"Wrinkles can only be drawn where the face suggests wrinkles, otherwise the makeup turns into a caricature. The whole secret of making up consists in knowing what to leave out. A few dots and lines with red or black at the eyebrows, nostrils or corners of the mouth are sufficient to change a whole countenance.

In making up the actor always considers beforehand the size and arrangement of illumination of the theater he is to play in. The lighter the theater is the more careful he has to be.

"A makeup exactly suited for the large stage of the Drury Lane would appear a frightful daub in the Lyceum," remarked Irving.

The actor has also to consider a certain central point of observation, and Irving accomplished this by introducing into his dressing room an expedient, the discovery of which is credited to Charles Fechter. He arranged electric lights on either side of his large makeup pier glass. By walking toward or away from the mirror the actor can study how his face will appear to the audience in various parts of the theater.

Before this mirror stood Henry Irving, giving a few last touches to his costume and wig, when the call boy knocked at the door.

Irving turned to me. "I hope you have profited by your call. Keep your eyes open and all will come of itself. No actor who has not a mastery of this art can properly rank as first class."

Then he left with a nod, and a minute later he entered upon the stage with his peculiar stride and step, familiar to every Londoner, and ejaculated, "Three thousand ducats—well!"—New York Herald.

Character in Sex.

Closely connected with these attempts to distinguish character is the effort to distinguish between the mental characteristics of the two sexes. This is a very difficult subject, on which one naturally shrinks from being dogmatic. But we may begin with a few certain physical facts. Just as the average woman is not so tall as the man and does not weigh so much, so, too, in the same proportion does she eat less and drink less, breathe less, and is, so we are told, less easily suffocated. The pulse of a woman is quicker than that of a man; her blood is not only less in quantity, but also of lighter specific gravity, and contains fewer red corpuscles. In physical configuration there is a striking difference.

A man's body forms an oval, with its greatest diameter through the shoulders; a woman's body is an oval, which is widest across the hips. The woman has the more undulating outlines, the man a more angular build. Perhaps it is not wholly fanciful to found on this last fact the conclusion that while women, because they have a greater bodily likeness to one another, have a greater conformity also to a general mental type, men tend to be more individual and less similar in their characters. But, of course, it is only of a general tendency that we can speak in this reference. When we come to special mental characteristics, which distinguish the two sexes, we are involved in controversy. There is probably no particular difference in the intellectual capacity between men and women; the apparent difference is generally due to the difference in emotional interests.—National Review.

Petroleum for Corns.

"You are troubled with corns, are you?" said a Pittsburger to one of his friends who walked with a peculiar limping gait. "Well, everybody has a remedy for them, but the trouble with most of the remedies is that they are no good without faith, and the man afflicted with corns generally considers his case hopeless. But I can tell you of a cure that is simple and effectual. Soak the afflicted portion of your feet for a considerable time every night—the longer the better—in crude petroleum; then saturate a cloth with the same stuff, wrap it around your toe, put your stocking on, and then go to bed.

"A few nights of this treatment will cause the corn to disappear. I first heard of this remedy when living in the oil region, and of course I laughed at it. But a little inquiry among the men who worked about the tanks and wells convinced me that they believed in it. They said they were never troubled with corns, and assured me that the frequent wetting of their shoes in the oil—a thing they cannot avoid in their occupation—had the effect of driving all these troublesome excrescenses away. Try it and it will cure you."—Pittsburg Dispatch.

The Warmest Region on Earth.

There are many very warm spots on the torrid zone, but Bohrin, by the Gulf of Persia, seems to be, as far as temperature goes, absolutely without a rival. For forty consecutive days in July and August, 1889, which was by no means an exceptional season, the thermometer was known not to fall lower than 100 degrees Fahrenheit, night or day, and often ran up as high as 128 degrees in the afternoon. Nature, as if to make the spots as intolerable to human beings as possible, has banished all water from the rocks of the locality—at least, none has ever been procured by digging to depths of nearly 500 feet, and the numerous pits or dry wells in the neighborhood show how thoroughly the upper stratum has been tapped. In spite of these apparently insuperable obstacles, however, mankind has contrived to flourish and multiply in this region to an amazing extent, and the necessary fresh drinking water which the land has refused to yield is obtained from the bottom of the Gulf of Persia, where, at a distance of more than a mile from the shore, innumerable copious springs burst forth.—Scotsman.

A Floating Island.

Sadawaga Lake, a large-sized pond in Whitingham, Vt., has one of the most remarkable islands in the world within its borders. The island is larger than any farm in the neighborhood, containing over 150 acres. Its peculiarities lie in the fact that it daily shifts its position, being first on the north, then on the south and again on the east or west borders of the lake. It is known as "the floating island," and has kept up its aberrant voyage since time out of memory. It has many trees upon its surface, some of which are from twenty to thirty feet in height, besides an immense thicket of cranberry bushes. It is rare that a portion of the island breaks off and sinks to the bottom, and its stability has made it a favorite resort for picnickers and others seeking an outing. Holes have been cut through the crust and fish caught, much after the fashion of catching them through the ice in winter time.—St. Louis Republic.

To Cool a Fevered Brow.

A well known druggist was deftly preparing some seidlitz powders the other day when I dropped in upon him. "A rounder or a man about town," said he, "has no business to complain of a headache after a night's dissipation. If he will only remember to take two of these blue papers and one of these white, mix them in water and swallow, he will get up next day as fresh as a daisy. There is nothing like a seidlitz to cool a fevered brow or calm a turbulent stomach."—St. Louis Republic.

A Handsome Young Author.

One of the handsomest literary men in Gotham is Edgar Fawcett, the novelist. He is a very hard worker and generally gets $3,000 for the serial publications of his novels. He is a scholarly man and is quick at seeing the shams of social life, and delights to wield his keen lance against them. He is a bachelor and lives at the Union club.—Cor. Chicago Herald.

A Soft Snap.

Young man, if you don't want to hustle, go to Samoa. You can get a hundred acres of good land there for $1.37, and the taxes on the same will be only thirty-nine cents a year. You can easily live on what grows wild on your land, so that you can spend all your time lying down and thinking what a soft snap you are having.—New York Tribune.

Too Much Liver.

"I guess I'll die of it," wearily said the landlady, when the boarders had all had their say.

"Die of what?" they chorused.

"Liver complaint. This is only the sixth time you've had liver this week, and yet I hear nothing but complaints about it."—Philadelphia Times.

A Biblical Thoroughfare.

"What an ogre of sanctity pervades this place," said old Mrs. Fussabout to her city nephew as they gazed up Baxter street; "when it ain't Moses Abraham I declare it's Job Lot!"—Dry Goods Chronicle.

ROPING TEXAS STEERS.

An Exciting Contest at a County Fair.

SAGACITY OF THE COWBOY'S PONIES.

Tussling with Furious Animals.—Men Who Have to be Quick.

One of the most interesting things I saw while I was in Texas was a roping contest at the Concho county fair. The winner of the first prize—a beautiful cowboy saddle—was to be the contestant who should rope and tie down a steer in the shortest time. The second prize was a gorgeous gold and silver trimmed sombrero, and was to be won by the contestant making second best time.

It is the intention to run up as close alongside or behind the steer as possible, and, while going about his own gait, throw the rope over his horns; then by following along with the rope slack it may be gotten clear under him as he runs; then by taking a turn around the pommel it is secured, the pony suddenly stopped, braced with all his strength, and the steer is thrown clean heels over head literally. By a dexterous jerk and good management a steer may be thrown when the rope has caught but one horn, but it will usually slip off.

If, when he has been roped and the rope made fast to the pommel, a steer suddenly bolts sideways, he is very apt to pull horse and rider over—especially if he be big and the pony little. When the steer has been thrown all right the rider jumps off and runs to tie him, leaving the pony to hold him by keeping the line from the pommel to his horns taut. And this was to me the prettiest picture in the whole panorama. The sagacious little pony standing with his nose to the fallen adversary, straining at the line, and watching the steer with bright, knowing eyes. He realizes that he's in a bad fix if the steer gets up, and he hasn't the least intention of letting him do so.

In the first place, all the wild and vicious steers that can be found on the ranges and ranches about are gathered up and brought, fighting, bellowing and protesting, to the fair grounds and put in a pen there.

HOW THE STEER IS ROPED.

When the fair commences the steer is haled about with sticks, clubs, yells and whoops, until perfectly maddened, when the outer bars are suddenly withdrawn and he leaps out into the opening. The contestant whose turn it is is stationed close to one side, and is after him like a shot.

The first steer was a big, lean, sorrel colored one, with horns about four feet across at the points, and that ran like a deer. The cowboy was a fine, handsome, keen looking fellow, and his pony one of the best cow ponies in the country, a little white fellow, bearing the favorite name of Possum, with big, bright, black eyes, as quick as a cat, a "regular trump." They got a fair start with the steer, the throw was made successfully, and then came the moment of suspense, when the pony was straining every nerve to keep with the steer, while the rider watched each turn to catch and throw him by an endwise jerk. This he succeeded in doing, then leaped from the saddle to "tie him down," leaving Possum to hold him. He had but touched the ground when the steer made a sudden convulsive effort and rose to his feet. But Possum's eye was on him; he instantly ran backward and jerked him flat. By this time the cowboy reached the steer, jumped on him and tied his feet and the business was completed.

Now recommenced the yelling and whooping, and a big white steer tears into the pen and is half across the bars before he can be beaten back. He finally bursts through the bars before they can be taken down. This time it is the deputy sheriff that afterward had the scrimmage with the Mexicans at Knickerbocker, mounted on a little claybank with silvery mane and tail—Capt. Scott, and a captain he proves himself.

He quickly overhauls the steer, the throw is made, the rope secured, and then the big brute bolts sideways like lightning, and horse and rider go over in horrible confusion.

Hurrah for the captain! He's up and off! It's he and the steer for it. And now there were screams and roars of laughter and shouts of admiration as the plucky little fellow dodged and tacked and jerked the big animal about till attendants could come up and cut the rope and drive him into the outer regions.

Here comes the next candidate for the rope. This time the roper is a handsome boy of 21 or 22, whose father owns a big ranch, of which the young man is manager. Off they go, the fiery little pony fairly flying over the ground. The steer is roped, thrown—not without a struggle—and has only to be tied to complete the job. But the moment he feel the young fellow's weight upon him he rises like a shot. Everybody is breathless—we hardly know whether to laugh or be terrified.

But the pony doesn't debate. He promptly hauls the would be "ridin' hoss" down with a backward plunge, and keeps dragging him a little as he struggles to rise, until his master has him safely tied; and all with such little snorts, such tossings of his pretty head, and kickings out of the little slim heels, such sharp neighs and flirtings of his tail as were for all the world like articulate speech.

This was the very cutest pony of all, and when his master got on him after tying down his steer he went off fairly dancing and swelling with pride and high spirits.

After this there were one or two failures, one horse falling in a prairie dog hole and one man missing the throw it had taken him long to get close enough to make. And now came an unusually wild, ugly steer, and the funniest kind of a pair to run after him and catch him. The pony was a little, ratty roan, and the man big, heavy and awkward looking. Everybody laughed when they sailed in close on the heels of the vamoosing, buckskin colored steer. But that little beetle bug of a pony just caught up with the great long legged creature, the big, clumsy looking man threw his rope like a streak of inebriated lightning over his horns, threw him endwise till I looked to hear his neck crack, then hopped out of the saddle like a little circus boy and tied him with neatness and dispatch. He, out of all the fine athletic looking men on fleet ponies, was the one to take the first prize, the saddle, and our handsome boy who was manager of his father's ranch bore off the sombrero, which ought to look appropriate enough on his black curls and shading his brilliant black eyes.

Altogether it was all that fancy painted it. Thrilling, exciting, making your heart leap with excitement and stand still with suspense. Such a display of man's mastery of powerful and frantic beasts is a Homeric spectacle, and one which appeals to the original savage which we are told sleeps in every nature.—Chattanooga Times.

Pelting candidates with dead cats, rotten cabbages and ditto eggs is the example of propriety that the voters of England set the wild and wooly people of the United States.

The refusal of Clarkson to act any longer as Chairman of the Republican National Executive Committee proves that the bitter feud that raged at Minneapolis is yet very far from being at an end.

Ex-Secretary Whitney comes out of the Chicago conflict as one of the most acute, brainy and tactful leaders that ever undertook to handle the cause of a candidate before a National convention.

R. O. Shively of Stockton is reported to be heartily ashamed of the exposure of his self abasement in becoming a railroad tool. None despise them more heartily nor drop them more quickly when they are no longer useful, than the men who use them.

One of the most lucrative offices in the gift of the President is that of United States Consul at Liverpool. That office is now held by Thomas H. Sherman, a near relative of James G. Blaine. Mr. Sherman has sent his resignation to Washington. This may be safely taken to mean that the friends of Blaine are preparing no good for Harrison in the campaign.

It looks as if Governor Markham were trying to find some show of excuse for the calling of the Legislature to meet in extra session. It would be less of an evil if all the hostile Indians in the United States were turned lo se in California than for that band of brigands to get in session at Sacramento again. Against armed Indians the people could protect themselves, but against the robbers of the Legislature with such a Supreme court as we have got to aid and abet them, we would be powerless.

The San Francisco CHRONICLE says that wagons are actually being built at Stockton for the freight line between that city and Fresno in opposition to the Southern Pacific. It is the most striking commentary possible on the character of the railroad service of California. We do not hear of mule teams running in competition with railroad trains in Kansas or other States, with whose transportation facilities our own have been compared for the benefit of the Railroad Commissioners.

The sympathy of all the people of the Nation goes out to ex-Secretary of State Blaine in the sudden affliction that has fallen upon him by the death of his son. Mr. Blaine's eminent position before the country for so many years, his intimate relation to National legislation, policy and administration of public affairs have made him so prominent a figure that his sad affliction naturally excites public sympathy, and calls forth from the American heart the sincerest condolences for the father and statesman who now walks in the valley of the shadow of death.

Petititions for an extra session of the Legislature have been presented to the Governor, but a dispatch says that official will hesitate before complying with the request, as the cost to the State will reach $100,000. The danger of getting the Legislature of a thousand scandals together again is fully appreciated, but unless it is done the counties will have to quit business for a time. Besides, the county government law passed last session has been declared unconstitutional by some of the courts, and the question is now pending in the Supreme court. But if the Legislature should be induced to repeal the coyote bounty law, the State would come out ahead by having an extra session.

Stanley had a rude reception from his East London constituents, when he appeared before them to solicit their suffrages at the coming general election. The "costermongers"—street peddlers, who made up the bulk of his audience, are rough, uncouth fellows, perhaps the roughest class in all London, and they had evidently got it into their heads that what had been said about Stanley's murderous tactics and his harsh and unjust treatment of subordinates in Africa was true. But there would seem to be some spark of chivalry even in the London "coster" for when Mrs. Stanley faced them and made a spirited defense of her husband they gave her a hearing. The picture of Explorer Stanley making a political campaign behind the skirts of his wife is not a very heroic one.

What Is Electricity?

If the question is now asked, "What is electricity?" we may reply advantageously, in the words of Jokai: A thing of which we know a little more than nothing and a little less than something. A little more than nothing, for we know that it is of the nature of light and heat, extending itself like them in waves of motion. A little less than something, for of the essence of electricity itself, whether static or dynamic, we are still absolutely in the dark. There has been no want of other theories, but the fundamental tendency of the age is to reduce all phenomena and forces to the fewest possible primaries, and it is not improbable that this will be facilitated by the wave theory of the so called ether.

The problem of gravitation, too, which was so long regarded as a force acting from a distance, is now equally attributed to the agency of a medium. In his efforts to demonstrate the oneness of all natural forces, the physicist is not likely to be led astray, even although the cognition of force presents one of those world problems, the solution of which must forever escape us; aye, although, as the final result of the most exact investigation, it should forever be denied to him even to assert decisively, "It is only a force, and the ether is its medium of transmission."—Exchange.

Verdi and His Admirer.

Verdi was traveling in the same railway carriage with General Tournon, commander of the Ravenna district. They got into conversation, which soon turned on the subject of music, and the general, who did not know his companion, expressed a most enthusiastic preference for that of Italy. "I can hardly go so far with you," replied the other, "For me, art has no frontiers, and I give German music the preference over Italian."

"Indeed, sir," said the general testily. "For my part, I would give all the German operas in the world for one act of 'Rigoletto.'"

"You really must excuse me from following you any further on this ground," replied the composer, blushing a little, "I am Verdi."—Monde Artiste.

A Coon Story.

Two men located a varmint in a tree and one scaled up for the prize. After an interval of several minutes, which were enlivened by skirmishing among the foliage, the man on the ground called out, "John, have you got him?"

"I have," came the decided response.

"Do you want me to climb up and help you hold him?"

"Thunder and lightning, no! I wish you'd come up and help me let loose!"—Nashville American.

FOR PRESIDENT,

GROVER CLEVELAND,

OF NEW YORK.

FOR VICE-PRESIDENT,

GEN. STEVENSON,

OF ILLINOIS.

Are you going to Big Pine for the Fourth.

No kick about cold weather now a days.

The apricot crop is very light and later than usual.

Poll and Hospital taxes will be delinquent after next Monday.

S. P. McKnight C. E. is expected down from Bishop this evening.

The Board of Supervisors meets next Tuesday, Monday being a legal holiday.

The Carson and Colorado railroad offers a special rate to Carson and return of $15, good from July 24 to July 6th.

See the notice of sale of personal propeity belonging to the Vagt estate to be sold at Independence next Saturday.

Irving Woodin arrived home from Pasadena yesterday morning. He has been attending school there for the past year.

Madden and Frevort will have a splendid crop of grain on the Vagt ranch. It is ripening fast and they expect to begin cutting in a few days.

There were several delightful showers of rain during the week. There was a very fair representation of an Eastern thunder shower on Wednesday.

Dr. Meade, the dentist, will come up from Keeler to-morrow and remain in town a week. Those desiring his services are requested to make an early appointment.

Quite a number of Independence people will attend the Fourth of July celebration at Big Pine. The people at that place have made extensive preparations toward the event.

Ben. Williams arrived at Independence yesterday from Modock and will remain in town for several days. He reports mining matters progressing very favorably in the southern country.

Mrs. A. K. Eugley accompanied by her son, Mr. Lowell Eugley, arrived home at Big Pine from San Francisco last Monday. Mr. Eugley will return to the law college at San Francisco at the end of vacation.

H. Clay Hampton arrived at Independence at the end of last week. He expects to make his future home in Owens Valley. Mr. Hampton comes highly recommended from Mono county in his vocation as a school teacher.

Thos. Williams, proprietor of the Big Pine hotel, is building a fine ball room just south of the hotel. It will be a two story structure, the lower part to be fitted up as a public hall and ball room. Charley McKay is boss carpenter.

The Board of Directors of the 18th Agricultural District will meet at Independence on Friday evening next to complete the arrangements for holding the Fair this year including the adoption of a premium list, speed programme, etc.

At Fish Springs several arastras are running on gold ore. Jack Welch and Arlie Mairs have a lot of ore that looks well and several other miners have very fair prospects. In a few weeks considerable bullion will be taken out up there.

About Bishop very little hay has yet been cut, though all the farmers expect to go at it next week. The first crop is reported to be light owing to the cold continuing far into the spring. The same conditions that were unfavorable to alfalfa were just right for wheat and oats, and the crop of those grains is reported to be unusually good.

Chamberlain's Colic, Cholera and Diarrhœa Remedy is the standard. Its many cures have won it praise from Maine to California. Every family and every traveler should be provided with it at all times. No other remedy can take its place or do its work. 25 and 50 cent bottles for sale by

A. K. EUGLEY,
Big Pine.

The "Independence Track Association" was incorporated at Independence last Saturday. The capital stock is $2,000, divided into 40 shares of $50 each. Twenty shares are already subscribed and an assessment of $20 per share is made payable immediately to the Secretary. A meeting of the stockholders was held last Saturday and the following were elected as a Board of Directors: E. Robinson, B. Rhine, Irv. H. Mulholland, J. C. Irwin and M. Muldoon. Irv. H. Mulholland, F. E. Densmore and J. S. Gorman were appointed as a committee on By-Laws. The Board of Directors met the same afternoon and organized by electing E. Robinson President, P. H. Mack Secretary and J. C. Irwin Treasurer. The Secretary was authorized to secure the services of S. P. McKnight to survey the ground for a new track and he has written that he will be here this evening for that purpose. The Association proposes to buy sufficient ground to construct a first-class race track as near to Independence as possible and negociations to that end are now in progress. The track will be well fenced and all necessary buildings erected. It will be a permanent improvement and will add greatly to the attractiveness of the town.

Six years ago to-day Independence was in ruins. There was not a business house left standing in the town and many dwellings were burned. Main street could only be located by the old cellars and smoking debris on either side. The town looked dreary and desolate, but the people were not despondent nor discouraged. They started to work immediately, and to-day we have a much prettier town than the old one. A better class of buildings was erected, and new shade trees were planted immediately. These have made thrifty growth and now present a beautiful appearance. The loss by fire on the 30th of June 1886 was not less than $250,000. For a small town to recover such a great loss and become even better situated than formerly indicates a most commendable spirit of enterprise and thrift on the part of the inhabitants. Like the Phœnix, we have risen from the ashes to a brighter and more prosperous existence than the former one.

It is expected that Craig Chambers of Park City, Utah, will be here shortly to settle up the affairs of the late W. A. Bolinger. It is not at all likely that Mr. Chambers will take any further interest in the mines at Crysopolis. It is said that there is nothing in sight there that would warrant extensive operations. A few men might make wages working on their own account, but this is all.

W. E. Hughes and C. O. Hawley were at Big Pine a few days this week looking over the land in that vicinity. C. Mulholland had talked with both of them many times during the past few years and at Big Pine they said that every statement he had made about the country they have found fully verified by what they have seen.

In a recent letter to the proprietors, Mr. H. M. Bangs, the druggist at Chatsworth, Ill., says: "I am very much pleased with Chamberlain's Cough Remedy. During the epidemic of la grippe here it took the lead and was very much better liked than other cough medicines." The grip requires precisely the same treatment as a very severe cold, for which this remedy is so efficient. It will promptly loosen a cold and relieve the lungs, soon effecting a cure, while most other medicines in common use for colds only give temporary relief; 50 cent bottles for sale by

SUNDRY FACTS ABOUT HARPS.

A Return to Favor of the Instrument First Made Popular by King David.

In the Strauss orchestra there is one American woman, a Miss Carusi, and she plays the harp. The harp she uses nightly cost $1,400 and was made by a firm in this city.

The harp is an old fashioned instrument of the sweetest tone and very difficult to play upon correctly. It looks simple enough to any one who has never examined a harp closely. It seems to consist of a certain number of strings which are pulled at by the player just as the strings of a banjo are pulled, except that there are no frets to bother one's fingers.

But in reality the harp is a most perplexing instrument. Those who play it say its mechanism is more involved than that of a piano. Notwithstanding this fact, it is becoming popular again among young women of social standing, who originate and sustain fashions of all sorts and in all directions. Of late there have been more harps ordered for amateurs than for professionals. The cost of such a harp as would be used by an amateur is from $450 to $1,000, as much as would be paid for a good piano.

Seven pedals surround the base of the harp. They are attached to as many rods, which run up through the pillar at the front of the harp, and are there hitched to more rods with a hold on the strings—a hold that can be removed or tightened by a pressure of the foot on the pedals. This mechanism corresponds in its effects to the shortening or lengthening of a violin string or the string of a guitar or banjo by running the finger along the frets.

There are forty-four strings to a harp, tuned to C natural. It is a particularly graceful and effective instrument for a woman to play if she has a good arm and wears short sleeves; and this may have something to do with its return to popular favor. It is also a very handsome instrument, or it may be made so with rich carving of the head and decorations upon the top of the sounding board.

Among the prominent amateur harpists in this city are Miss Hewitt, daughter of ex-Mayor Hewitt; Miss Drexel, daughter of Joseph W. Drexel, the banker; Mme. de Barrios and the Countess Jerxmanouski.—New York Evening Sun.

Two Bouquets.

At a flower show in India the ladies were judges in one hall, while in another hall the gentlemen awarded the prizes. A comparison of results brought into strong light the contrast of opinions, or rather the difference of standards.

"We had no great difficulty," says Mrs. King in her book, "in awarding the prize for the best arranged cut flowers to a basket filled with a most graceful and artistic combination of scarlet, yellow, white and blue.

"It was in amusing contrast to another bouquet to which the masculine judges awarded their first prize. We begged them to let us guess which was the prize winner, and going round the table we unanimously fixed on one, but the men shook their heads. So we tried again, and after fixing unsuccessfully on three more we humbly confessed ourselves beaten.

"The judges' faces fell, and with some shyness they pointed out the arrangement that had seemed to them the most commendable. It was like a cauliflower in shape, and contained a great quantity of flowers all so tight and neat that they might have been clipped! Our presence of mind was not equal to saying more than 'Oh, really!' and one of the judges remarked almost apologetically, 'You see we like something solid!'"

A Trifle Too Cool.

"Doctor, just an instant, please," exclaimed a caller at the office of a man of physic as he caught sight of the physician disappearing into his private office.

"I'll see you shortly, sir," was the curt reply.

"But a second is all I want," persisted the caller.

"I'll see you directly, sir," with sternness.

The visitor took a seat in the general reception room, read the afternoon paper, looked at the pictures and played with the dog. After thirty minutes or more had passed the medicine man came out of his den and, with an air of condescension, said to the visitor:

"Well, now, sir, I am at your service. Your turn has come. What can I do for you?"

"Oh, nothing in particular," was the reply. "I just dropped in to tell you that just before I called I saw a couple of men clearing your garden of those flowers you had put in yesterday; that's all."—London Tit Bits.

A TALE WITH A MORAL.

Busy Men Should Keep Themselves Posted Concerning Prominent Men.

George B—— is an extremely busy young Wall street man. He is ambitious, and for several years he has been devoting all of his time to business in the hope of finally attaining an independence. Prosperity in his case has not been of rank growth, but he is still confident. He was called to a small Connecticut town some time ago. He finished what he had to do and found that he must wait an hour for the return train. Glancing over the register of the little hotel he saw a familiar name. It was that of a man who has attained great eminence as a traveler, a writer and a lecturer.

Some years ago B. had known him slightly, and had admired him a great deal. He could think of no better way of passing a portion of the hour than by calling upon the distinguished man. He quieted a fear that the traveler might not wish to be disturbed by the resolution to make his call brief. He was received cordially. He was presented to the wife of the traveler. He noticed that she was a very beautiful woman.

At once B. plunged into a mire of errors. Ignorant of the fact that the newspapers (he was a very busy young man and did not read the newspapers closely) had chronicled all of the movements and plans of the traveler, and had told of his great achievements, B. began to inquire what he had accomplished, what particular work he was then engaged upon, how he contrived to compass all of the demands upon his time, and to seek other interesting information. The traveler responded graciously, and told B. many entertaining things about himself.

Unobservant of a look, first of surprise and then of slight impatience, which passed over the face of the traveler's wife, B—— departed after having spent a very pleasant quarter of an hour.

A few days later he met a friend who was also a friend of the traveler.

"You met K—— up in Connecticut the other day," said this friend.

"Yes," replied B——, with wild enthusiasm, "I was very glad to see him again. I had an interesting call."

"H-m!" responded his friend reflectively. "You appear to have made rather a poor impression on his wife."

"Why, how so?" exclaimed B., much surprised. "I thought her very charming."

"Well," answered the friend, "I met her yesterday. She told of your call. She asked me if you were thought to be a particularly bright young man. I spoke a good word for you. She said: 'Well, I was rather disappointed in him. Why, he didn't know a single thing about my husband. I never saw quite such a display of ignorance.'"

The moral of this simple tale is this: Before you meet a great man and his wife find out all about him. She knows the subject by heart and she has little charity for those who do not."—New York Times.

Snakes and Toads for Medicine.

Dried snakes, the Chinese believe, are good medicine where a complaint is difficult to diagnose, for the reason that the serpent in life inserts itself into all sorts of holes and crevices, and is likely after death to seek the uttermost parts of the body. Such concretions of limy matter as are formed in the gall bladders of cows cure St. Vitus' dance and smallpox. These same concretions are the very things that are known by ignorant people in this country as so called "madstones," used for applying to snake bites. The orientals believe in the effectiveness of dried toads as a tonic, and think caterpillars a sure remedy for bronchial troubles.

Salted scorpions, they assert, are admirable for smallpox, and silkworms, as well as the skins which locusts leave on trees on vacating them, are supposed to have wonderful medicinal virtues. Bones of the cuttlefish or sepia are believed by them to have virtues in the treatment of cancer. They think that the sepia is a bird transformed into a fish. They use clam shells for a cathartic and maggots to cure dysentery. Powdered fossil crabs are, in the opinion of their physicians, an antidote for poisons of all sorts, and seed pearls cure troubles of the heart and liver.—Washington Star.

Where Vanderbilt Worships.

No one who ever attends a quiet brown church on Madison avenue could ever believe that the soberly dressed man and woman, accompanied by two or three quiet looking children who regularly attend St. Bartholomew's, could be Cornelius Vanderbilt and his family. They come often on foot if the day is fine down from the Fifth avenue and Fifty-seventh street mansion to occupy year after year the same pew in the unfashionable church, to which they give with princely generosity. Again and again have they been formally invited to lend the assistance of their name and wealth to more fashionable churches, but Cornelius is a man of sensible, simple tastes and is admired for his devotion to the sanctuary of his choice.—New York Cor. Chicago News.

Jefferson Miller, of Jeffersonville, Ind., has good reasons for his strong dislike of both rats and threshing machines. In 1872 he was feeding a threshing machine in the barn when a rat ran across the floor. Turning to watch it his left hand was pulled off by the machine. Again in 1887, while feeding the same machine in the identical barn above mentioned, a rat ran between his feet. He kicked at it, slipped and had his only remaining hand ground to a pulp in the greedy machine.—St. Louis Republic.

CUSTOMS FRAUDS.

Some Startling Developments Coming.

ANOTHER CASE IN THE HISTORY OF SMUGGLING.

An Interesting Story Concerning the Appraiser's Office Comes to Light.

That the full extent of the customs frauds perpetrated by well known and heretofore reputable men here is not yet known and that further startling developments will appear, is made evident by the hints and actions of the government agents sent here to unravel the dark combinations made by wealthy merchants and the Custom House employees.

"When the Grand Jury has completed its investigations" said a prominent government official yesterday, "and when the reports made to the treasury department in Washington by Solicitor Hepburn, Superintendent of Special Agents Tingle and Assistant Secretary Crouse are made public there will appear the story of a system of customs frauds which involves more people of respectability and wealth than perhaps any smuggling scheme ever unearthed by the government before. There will then be more names mentioned in connection with these frauds than are identified with them now."

In the course of his persistent investigations about the Custom House an Evening Post reporter yesterd learned some things of interest concerning an old and trusted employee in the appraisers office from which Appraiser Levy was so recently dismissed. This man is T. O. Lewis, who through all the changes of several successive administrations has remained chief clerk of the appraiser's department. The searching investigation of the affairs of this department made by Solicitor Hepburn, left not the slightest reflection on the competence and trustworthiness of Mr. Lewis. Mr. Lewis, it was learned, is a man whose name is known throughout America and in many foreign lands, although his comparatively obscure official position has given him but little local fame. The story of how his fame was acquired is an interesting one. It is based entirely on the story of how his life was saved several years ago. He told it in 1887 as follows:

"Some six months or more ago, I was taken with an attack of something resembling my old complaint. My doctor pronounced it to be Nephritis. It yielded readily to the usual treatment for such cases, and I again resumed the use of Warner's Safe Cure, which I had not touched for several years. I thought at the time it was something remarkable that this attack passed off without the passage of stones, as formerly, although I carefully watched for them. I therefore, came to the conclusion that my doctor's diagnosis was correct, and that the attack was nothing more nor less than a simple inflammation of the kidneys caused by a cold settling there. Some two months later I noticed a slight pain in urinating. This increased until it culminated in inflammation of the prostate gland, and stranguary of the neck of the bladder, causing a complete stoppage of the flow of the urine. Two physicians essayed to relieve the bladder by catherization without avail. A third was more successful by distending the urethra, and introducing a very large catheter. The desired result was obtained, and when the instrument was withdrawn, it brought away a stone weighing 53 grs., which proved upon a chemical analysis to be an oxalic of lime. This was followed in the course of a few days by the passage of more than forty stones, varying in size from an ordinary pin's head to that of a pea. Some of these stones were smooth, others, including the largest were rough and jagged. They could hardly have passed the urethra in that condition. I continued the use of Warner's Safe Cure, and a few days afterwards passed at intervals a quantity of black sand. All unpleasant symptoms have now disappeared, and I am quite well."

This account of how he conquered an ailment which has proved fatal to so many, was published wherever the English language is spoken, in connection with many similar testimonials.

Speaking of the matter yesterday, Mr. Lewis said: "When I had found that Warner's Safe Cure had done me more good than the doctors could do," I recommended it to friends and acquaintances afflicted with kidney troubles whenever I had an opportunity. There were so many that I remember but few of the names, but in every case in which I heard of the results the treatment resulted successfully. There were so many of the clerks and laborers about the department who had kidney disease in some stage that I bought several cases of the cure and supplied them at cost."

"What surprised me most was the mass of inquiries which I received from all over the world. They even came from the West Indies, Mexico and Japan. I replied to fifteen or twenty of them saying that my testimonial was reliable in every particular and then I quit troubling myself with them. I remember that I received a letter from one gentleman who was a merchant in Yokohama saying that he had used Warner's Safe Cure through having read my testimonial and that it had cured him of a similar trouble. As far as I am concerned I have never had a recurrence of my affliction since I was cured as related nearly six years ago."—San Francisco Evening Post.

Use for Old Papers.

Newspapers are invaluable for packing away the winter clothing, the printing ink acting as a defiance to the stoutest moth as successfully as camphor or tar paper. For this reason newspapers are useful under the carpet, laid over the regular carpet paper. The most valuable quality of newspapers in the kitchen, however, is their ability to keep out the air. It is said that ice completely enveloped in newspapers, so that all air is shut out, will keep a longer time than under other conditions, and that a pitcher of ice water laid in a newspaper, with the ends of the paper twisted together to exclude the air, will remain all night in any summer room with scarcely any perceptible melting of the ice.—American Analyst.

MARION HARLAND'S OPINION.

Our readers are familiar not only with the sprightly writings of Marion Harland, but also with her sound common sense upon matter of every day life and action. Her name, indeed, is a household word, and is equally well known in parlor and kitchen. Her celebrated cook book, "Common Sense in the Household," is without a peer and shows that she has made a careful study of how to prepare good, wholesome food, in the best manner by the best materials. In this issue we produce a fac-simile letter from Marian Harland that speaks from her experience in the highest terms of the unequaled qualities of the Royal Baking Powder. Housewives everywhere should read the opinion of such an expert and act accordingly. All good cooks, who have used the Royal, are of the same opinion also.

Some Queer Jail Razors.

When I was in charge of the city jail, several years ago, as a disciplinary measure I abolished the jail barber shop. A week passed, and when the men were let out on Sunday afternoon for exercise I was much astonished to find that most of the young men were cleanly shaved. The next morning I called the prisoners out in line and ordered a search of the cells. The result was the discovery of four "razors." And such razors! Truly, said I, necessity is the mother of invention.

The razors had, in every instance, been made of the piece of spring steel that sustains the instep of a shoe or boot and is known as "the shank." This is easily removed from the shoe and will stand a very fine edge. The ingenious amateur cutlers, after putting an edge upon the steel by means of a piece of stone, or by rubbing it against the iron bedstead, would make a handle by wrapping twine around half of the blade.

Prisoners are allowed soap. These four razors had been passed from cell to cell all over the jail. I had to confiscate the "razors," and, as in the hands of the vicious they would have been quite dangerous, I kept a sharp lookout for them ever after. During my term I captured no less than ten of these peculiar razors. Their manufacture continued even after I re-established the barber shop.—Interview in St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Startling a Stranger.

Down below Natchez, while the boat was running in close to the left hand bank and had stopped her wheels to avoid a big tree floating in an eddy, we saw a native sitting on a stump fishing. He sat bent over, hat over his eyes and there was scarcely a movement to tell that he was alive. We had a smart Aleck with us on the promenade deck, and he had no sooner caught sight of the native than he called to one of the deck hands to toss him up a potato. A peck or more of the tubers were lying loose near a pile of sacks and one was quickly tossed up.

"Now see me startle him," said Smart Aleck as he swung his arm for a throw.

The distance was only about a hundred feet, and his aim was so true that the potato landed on the native's head with a dull thud. His motions were so quick that we couldn't agree as to how he did it, but in about three seconds he had dropped his fishpole, pulled a revolver as long as his arm and fired at Smart Aleck. The bullet bored a hole in his silk hat just above his hair, and the young man sank down in a heap and fainted dead away. When we restored him to his senses he carefully felt of the top of his head, looked back at the fisherman and absently asked:

"Did she explode both boilers or only one?"—New York Sun.

One Way of Grieving.

Scarcely any two people take a severe bereavement alike. Aside from the two general classifications of grieving noisily or calmly, there are innumerable subdivisions possible, through the wide range of personal characteristics. At a dancing party in a neighboring city not long ago a young woman visiting one of the guests appeared with her. She was a beautiful, stylish girl, and being a stranger naturally came in for much attention. Her gown was a very gay one, she danced incessantly and there was nothing in her demeanor to indicate that she was other than a jolly, pretty girl, greatly enjoying an evening of dancing. It transpired later, however, that she had buried her mother, to whom she was greatly devoted, barely a fortnight before, and apparently unable to accept the usual seclusion and somber garb went at once to visit a friend, took all her pretty gowns and avoided no gayeties. Those who knew her best knew that her grief was overwhelming, but she preferred to stifle it in this way.—New York Times.

In Paris, it is said, it is not customary for patients to wait in the antechamber of great physicians, but inquiry has to be made by letter. In some cases numbered tickets are given out at 6 in the morning. The physicians' servants do a thriving business selling sandwiches, etc., to the waiting patients.

IN THE NICK OF TIME.

The nick of time to stop the course of bladder and kidney complaints is when the organs concerned exhibit a tendency to grow inactive. The healthful impulse toward activity that they receive from Hostetter's Stomach Bitters rescues them from impending danger, and averts such dangerous maladies as Bright's disease and diabetes. Sluggishness of the kidneys increases a liability to chronic rheumatism, gout and dropsy, and since the blood is filtered by these organs in its passage through them, the operation of the Bitters serves a doubly happy purpose. The medicine acts without exciting, like the fiery stimulants of commerce. Malarial, dyspeptic, constipated and nervous invalids are thoroughly relieved by it. Since the advent of that shocking malady, la grippe, it has been widely demonstrating its usefulness as a curative and preventive of it.

C. F. Klunder, of No. 907 Broadway, New York, is one of the best known florists in America. Florists, like other persons, are subject to the ills of life, notwithstanding the fragrance surrounding their calling, but like other persons they can be cured of their ills. Mr. Klunder writes:

"I cordially recommend ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS. I have found them after 10 years' constant use, wonderfully efficacious in coughs, colds, pains in the side, back and chest. As chest protectors and shields against changes in the weather they are invaluable. My hothouse men use a great many, and I and family are never without this never failing external remedy."

"Tommy, asked the lady who was calling on his mother, "have you any sisters or brothers?" "No," said Tommy, "I'm all the children we want around this house."

DEAFNESS CAN'T BE CURED

by local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube gets inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed Deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

We will give One Hundred Dollars for any case of Deafness (caused by Catarrh) that we can not cure by taking Hall's Catarrh Cure. Send for circulars, free.

CARE.

You may ride in the early morning,
You may ride in the dewy night,
You may ride till your eyes outrival
All the star eyes' light,
You may sway to the graceful motion
Of your sensitive, thoroughbred mare,
You may race with the winds and the ocean—
But you cannot outride care.

You may ride with the grace of an angel,
With a heart and a soul on fire,
You may ride till your road swims beneath you,
Until you and your thoroughbred tire,
You may ride till your cheeks are like roses,
With the red, rich wine of the air,
You may ride till the night runs to morning—
But you cannot outride care.

HER FORGOTTEN PAST.

He stood under the spicy pepper trees looking down at her, his face softened by a great tenderness. How dainty and sweet she was. Why was it that he seemed ever to stand at the portals of paradise, catching glimpses of the glory within, but never permitted to enter? And yet she had promised to be his wife, this beautiful girl, given to him by the mighty ocean that tossed its foam dashed spray on the white beach at their feet.

She recognized his true worth, his nobility of heart; she had given him all the love her woman's heart had to give, and yet—and yet——

He seemed intuitively to feel that there were depths to her heart which he had never fathomed; that she was capable of a more intense, absorbing devotion than any sentiment he had awakened in her.

At times when his great, unselfish heart lay bare before her a shadow would creep into her beautiful eyes and a tender regret would quiver across her face, like the flutterings of a memory; but the shadow never became distinct enough for her to quite remember.

"It is as if there was something in my past which I ought to recall," she would say, nestling closer to him, as if imploring his protection against the memory. "Oh, that long, blank past of mine. What is it that lies beyond the morning when you found me on the beach, Jack?" she questioned.

"My darling, I would help you to solve the mystery if I could, even though I knew that the solving of it would break my own heart," he replied, tenderly.

"As if it could," she whispered, slyly. "You are the best man on earth, Jack, and I wonder that you should care for a foolish little girl like me, who has forgotten everything she knew before she came to you—name, age and all; who is so much a part of your own self that the words she speaks are your words; the songs she sings, your songs; the thoughts she thinks, your thoughts. When I awoke from that dreadful death like stupor into which the terror of the wreck or the almost death in the waves had plunged me, I had everything to learn again, even to my alphabet and the names of the household furniture." She laughed merrily at her misfortune, but the shadow deepened in the kind eyes regarding her so tenderly.

"For that reason it seems like a most unkind and unworthy advantage I am taking," he responded seriously. "There will always be a thought lying like a shadow between us, dear, that if you could remember your past you might never have been my wife."

"I shall never think it, I am sure; but I do wonder what that past was. It is so trying, Jack, to know that a part of one's existence is a blank. It is as if I had lived on earth, died to it, and then come back again under different conditions, and—well, it is very annoying to say the least." Then seeing the shadow on his face, she laid her hand in his and added, coaxingly: "But let us forget it, Jack, dear, since we cannot remember, let us try to feel as if all my past was spent here, in this pretty cottage by the sea, with the love of your dear mother and your dear self to fill all the crevices of it. This is the only home I have any knowledge of, and though we know that those other years were spent somewhere, it matters little to us where, since we are all the world to each other, you and I."

He clasped her close in his strong arms, and kissed her trusting, upturned face, but the ache did not go out of his heart; the pain of it grew more poignant as the days passed by and she became dearer to him with the passage of each golden moment.

From his earliest childhood Jack Lathrop had loved the ocean. It had been his playmate, companion and instructor. It had filled all the requirements of his life from the moment when, a toddling babe, his mother had found him, waist deep in the green, salt water, laughing in boisterous glee as the foam flecked billows broke over his head.

The great, grand, mysterious ocean had been his friend since then. It had also afforded the means of providing for his widowed mother, for he was only a humble fisher lad, great hearted and kind, but of humble occupation.

The last best thing that his old friend, the ocean, had done for him was the giving to him this beautiful girl, who came with suggestions of a higher, nobler life than his in every move of her queenly body and every gesture of her white, shapely hands.

She must have received a blow on the head at the time of the accident, when she had been washed ashore, for she had forgotten every event of her past life and began her new life under Jack Lathrop's tuition, learning with other lessons the lesson of love and respect for her teacher, and because she remembered no better love than that which she gave to him, she thought it the best of which she was capable.

They were very busy in the cottage on the beach making ready for the coming wedding.

The morning of the marriage day she said to Jack's mother:

"I seem to belong to Jack. He saved my life and taught me all I know. When once I am his wife I hope that no accident, or circumstance, will ever reveal my forgotten past. I would much rather have no memory but that which you and Jack have given me."

Mrs. Lathrop kissed her sweet flushed face, thinking what a darling daughter she would be, and how Jack's life, and her own, were blest in her dear love.

Their wedding day dawned, dark and forbidding. There had been a fearful storm the night before and the angry billows, lashed into foam, ran high upon the beach, almost at times dashing against the cottage where the neighboring fisher families were gathered to join in the marriage festivities.

The bride, sweet Elsie, whose very name had been a thought of Jack's, looked fairer and sweeter than ever in her pretty wedding dress. Her blue eyes shone like sapphires, and her yellow hair crowned her regal little head like a coronet of glory. The pink flush of shy modesty fluctuated under her clear, transparent skin, and Jack marveled that so beautiful a creature could consent to become his wife.

"My life shall be one long devotion to her, and whatever will contribute to her happiness that will I do." Jack made this vow out under the peppers, and the vow once taken, he felt that it bound him by sacred fetters.

They were about to go out to the "best room," where the minister waited to "make them one," when an alarm was sounded, and all eyes were turned toward the beach.

Beyond the line of breakers a ship was helplessly beating about in the storm.

The assembled merry makers rushed out of the cottage, turning white, startled faces toward the awful scene, for they knew that rescue was hopeless.

One solitary figure remained on the deck of the ill fated vessel. The rest, as was afterward learned, had entered one of the small boats, hours before, taking with them provisions, and had left this man to his fate, because he was sick and helpless in his berth below.

Crawling to the upper deck of the sinking vessel he had discovered land, and saw that a line of ugly breakers tossed between himself and safety.

Those hardy, storm beaten fishermen realized in an instant the man's desperate situation. There seemed to be no possible hope for him. Who among them would court almost certain death for the uncertain chance of saving a stranger's life?

The most they could do was to stand on the shore and give him their sympathy until the ship went down.

How tall and straight he stood, distinctly outlined against the heaving waters and the angry sky beyond.

Seeming to realize the utter hopelessness of his situation he folded his fever emaciated arms across his breast and waited for death.

Suddenly a cry from the bride's white lips rang out over the turbulent waters.

She had recognized the man, and her sleeping memory awoke, unrolling the picture of the past before her startled vision.

Reaching her white imploring hands across the waters, heedless of all else save the one doomed man, she cried out:

"Henry, Henry, come to me. Oh, my darling, I cannot let you die."

In that moment Jack Lathrop knew that he, too, was doomed; that her awakened memory could never sleep again. He had read his heart's death sentence in her white, agonized face; he saw it in her wide, appealing eyes.

"Elsie," he said in a low, intense voice, while his heart lay gasping in its death agonies, "what is that man to you?"

"Forgive me, Jack," she sobbed, "I did not know. I had forgotten. My past was sure to come back some time, and when it did—oh, Jack, he is all the world to me. Do not let him die."

She was kneeling on the beach, lifting her clasped hands to him supplicatingly.

Stepping lower upon the beach Jack Lathrop put his hand to his mouth and shouted across the waters:

"Courage, I will save you yet!"

Then turning he lifted Elsie from her lowly position, his white, stern face softening as he did so, and said in tremulous tones of entreaty:

"In another hour you would have been my wife, Elsie. Give me one kiss. It is to be the last. He will not care when he knows."

She put her white arms about his neck, sobbing:

"Oh, Jack, my more than brother, forgive me, that I did not remember before."

With her kiss—it was only a sister's kiss, as he knew—on his lips, he went to his death, the brave, strong fellow, more powerful than any two of those stalwart fishermen about him.

His white faced bride never knew how he reached the vessel's side, she saw only the tall form on its deck; her thoughts, her prayers, were all for him who held her heart in his keeping.

Presently a shout from those about her proclaimed the fact that Jack had reached the vessel's side in safety, bearing with him the stout rope which was to assist in the return.

Having secured the rope about his rival's waist the two men began the difficult return, Jack breasting the billows manfully and supporting the nearly fainting man at his side in his strong arms.

The men upon the shore drew in the rope, breathing long, deep breaths, and every breath was a prayer (for those fishermen were not insensible to religious sentiments) for the safety of those two men.

Nearer and nearer they come, and now the pretty bride is on her knees again and the billows dash their spray over her. She is supplicating wildly, but the name on her lips and in her heart is Henry, not Jack.

Now they have reached the beach and the men wade out to meet them. A dozen hands draw the exhausted stranger secured to the rope out of the waters and a dozen more reach for Jack. But where is he, the brave, noble fisherman, who, treading on his own heart, went out to save his rival?

They turn to congratulate him and—lo, he is gone!

He had seen his rival in safety, and then—was it design or accident? They never knew. The waves with which he had battled for his sweet bride's happiness bore him out on their strong breast to the great, boundless expanse of waters, and they never looked upon his face again.—Detroit Free Press.

The Scilly Islanders.

A traveler who has visited the Scilly Isles says: "You have not been in Scilly five minutes before you are struck with the remarkable purity of the English spoken. There is no dialect, no provincialism; every word is clearly enunciated, every sentence is perfectly constructed, and a Scillonian, no matter what his position, can talk with you on any subject. They are politicians, moralists, philosophers and practical men of business as well. Nothing in Scilly struck me so much as the high order of intelligence and vast general knowledge of the inhabitants.

"The engineers on the steamboats, the man who rows you about the islands, the gardener at work among his flowers, will all converse with you on any general topic you like to start, and force you to admit that, in the art of talking, the result of wide reading and intelligent observation, in pure and elegant English, they have not their equal in any part of the kingdom. There is only one policoman for all the islands, and he goes fishing or gardening all the week, and only puts his uniform on on Saturday night. There is one island containing over 200 inhabitants, in which there are only two men who are not total abstainers, and only one man who smokes. The islands appear to be very healthy, for we are told that there is only one doctor for all the islands."

ACTING HORSE.

The Animal Was Taught Many Amusing Tricks Which he Never Forgot.

HIS ANTICS AT THE SUPPER TABLE.

Getting Drunk on Brandy and Water.—He Recognizes his Master After a Long Separation.

If the owner applies to his horse the rule of kindness and not of fear, it is astonishing how intelligent, sympathetic and obedient the horse becomes. It also very frequently will retain the most clear and distinct recollection of its old master and its previous training and habits, although a long interval of time may have elapsed since the master and it met.

This is amusingly illustrated in the well authenticated instance of a horse called Punch, owned and trained by the late Mr. Astley, the proprietor for many years of the establishment called by his name (now Sanger's theater) on the Surrey side of the Thames.

Astley was on the best of terms with Punch, and had taught it no end of clever tricks. After a variety of gambols with the clown it would thrust its head and neck through a napkin made for the purpose, then sit down to a well spread table, knock its hoof on the table as a hint to the clown, its attendant, to hurry up and be sharp. It would furiously seize with its mouth the bellpull. It would then eat whatever was brought, mock turtle—i. e., bran mash, a bread fowl, turnips, carrots, oats, beans, etc., called in the play bill by French culinary terms in fashion. Taking a kettle in its mouth by the handle it would pour some water in a punch bowl, seize a bottle made for the purpose and labeled "brandy," pour it into the punch bowl, and deliberately nodding, would drink the clown's health. Then it would gayly waltz, and finally fall down as a drunken man would. This scene would bring down a hurricane of applause. Punch was voted unanimously a "star" performer.

After some time Mr. Astley made up a company, with Punch among the number, and sent them on tour into the provinces. They exhibited with various success until they reached Galway, where, from bad management or bad luck, they collapsed. Owing to difficulty in communicating with Mr. Astley—or something worse—the creditors seized the effects and stud, and poor Punch was hauled off and sold at a horse fair. All traces of the horse were lost, although Mr. Astley did all he could to discover and regain his favorite.

Four years afterward Astley, chancing to be in a rough quarter of the town, espied in a costermonger's cart a wretched looking, downcast creature, with bones almost protruding through its skin, and a miserable likeness to the lost favorite.

Astley in doubt stood still and tremulously said, "Punch," whereupon the coster's animal pricked up its ears, stood up on its hind legs, upset the costermonger and the cart's contents and breaking loose waltzed up to its old master. Astley's "Down, sir," was instantly obeyed and there was perfect and touching recognition between the two.

"Will you part with the animal?" inquired Astley of the costermonger.

"Yes, and glad to be rid of it for a five pound note."

After having paid the money, the costermonger told him what he had heard and himself knew about the horse. It was able enough "to take yer 'air out by the roots;" if it ever saw a kettle on the fire it would rush in, seize and commence all sorts of games; that it would tug at bellpulls, put its hoofs on the table, till table or bell came to grief; and if the band played in the street, it would waltz like a real Christian and then pretend to "fall dead like a herring."

In less than a month, after having been well fed and tended, Punch was back at its old post, looking as fat as brawn and ringing bells and drinking brandy and water, recollecting all its old clever comical tricks—as great and general a favorite as ever.—London Tit-Bits.

Pilgrims to Mecca.

To kiss the black stone which, according to all true believers, fell from heaven, and to drink from the well Zemzen, the waters of which are daily replenished from the fountains of paradise, are the main objects of the 100,000 pilgrims or so who annually visit Mecca. Unfortunately those who are responsible for the health and good government of the holy city make no manner of provision for the periodical influx of the devotees, who have to herd like cattle in the fields and open streets. In spite of the presence of the holy well the water is filthy, and thousands of pilgrims who reach Mecca in good health either perish there or return with the seeds of disease and death in their frames. So far as the pilgrims from Bombay are concerned, 20 to 50 per cent. of those who leave the port for Mecca never return. In one year (1888) out of 13,970 who sailed from Bombay 7,465 were reported "missing." They had, in fact, either died at Mecca or on board the pilgrim ships. During the past six years, out of 64,638 true believers dispatched from Bombay to the Red sea, upward of 21,000 perished.—London Lancet.

His Own Joke.

Few jokers love jokes so well they will work one on themselves, but one has been reported at this office. One day the joker in question was going home in the midst of a thunder storm and a bobtail car. He stood the lightning flashes for several minutes and finally rang the bell.

"What the mischief are you going to do?" asked his wife.

"I'm going to get off."

"What are you going to do that for in all this storm?"

"Safety, my dear, safety," he said firmly. "You see, there's no conductor on this car, and if the lightning should strike it we'd all be knocked into hash and splinters," and if his wife hadn't held on to his coat tails he would have gone out into the storm just to have made his joke a success.—Detroit Free Press.

Twenty-Five Costly Buttons.

A young woman of refined appearance and stylish attire walked into an uptown jewelry establishment the other day, and placing twenty-five five dollar gold pieces on the velvet mat which a polite clerk laid before her on the glass counter, said, "I want these coins made into souvenir buttons." She then unfolded a slip of paper, on which the names of twenty-five places and objects of interest in Europe were written. She explained that a very dear friend—her school chum in fact—was to be married, and she intended to present her a handsome morning robe with each button, a reminder of a pleasant summer which they spent together abroad.—New York Times.

CORK TREES IN CALIFORNIA.

It Is Believed That They Can Be Grown There in Large Numbers.

The available forests of cork trees are already relatively extensive, although hardly sufficient to supply the demands now made on them, or which as the world grows in prosperity must be made on them, for there is hardly any end to the uses for cork, and none of the substitutes for it which have yet been tried are very satisfactory or promise to take its place to any great extent. The latest estimates of existing areas of available cork oak forests make their extent from 3,300,000 to 3,500,000 acres, of which about one-half, including those on its African possessions, belongs to France. The wood of the cork oak is heavy, coarse grained and of a yellow brown color; it shrinks and warps badly in seasoning and decays rapidly when exposed to the action of the atmosphere. It has little value in the arts, but furnishes a useful fuel and makes good charcoal. The inner bark is rich in tannin, and trees too old or unfit to produce cork are cut for the sake of the inner bark.

The cork oak is an interesting tree to Americans, as its cultivation now seems destined to become an important industry in California, where the climate and the soil in many parts of the state are admirably suited to produce it. This is not a mere theory, as trees have been growing now for several years in California, and have already produced crops of cork of excellent quality. It is probable that the tree will grow rather more rapidly in California than it does in its native country, although the quality of the soil, the exposure in which the trees are placed, local climate and the treatment which the trees receive will influence, of course, the rapidity with which the bark is developed.

In Africa it is found that the trees which grow the most rapidly produce bark of the poorest quality, and that within certain limits the slower the trees grow the more valuable the product, provided the growth is not too slow, in which case the bark loses some of the elasticity which makes it valuable. The conditions which influence the development of cork are so numerous and complicated that the product of all the trees in a grove or forest can never attain the same uniformity of thickness or quality in any given time. This is so well understood in the countries where cork is grown that the best method of harvesting has been found to be to go over the forest every two or three years and remove the bark from such trees as are covered with merchantable cork and not to strip all the trees at the same time.

All these matters must of course be considered in connection with planting forests of cork oak in California. The planting and care of such forests in Portugal and Spain have long been an important industry, and there is no reason why they may not be made so in California, where the local consumption of cork is already enormous, although the wine industry there is hardly more than in its infancy.—Garden and Forest.

Government Weather.

There are occasional gleams of humor even in the most serious articles which newspapers ever publish. A recent one on "The Business Outlook" contained the following paragraph:

"Thanks to the administration's want of foresight the dry weather of the past season has become exceedingly menacing to the agricultural interest."

The journal does not explain how the government could have prevented a drought in a portion of the country, or a wet season in another. Perhaps it thinks that the government ought to have some influence with its own barometer.

This criticism brings to mind the not unfamiliar criticism of a western farmer in a season of heavy rains.

"Rain, rain, rain!" said the farmer. "An' this is what we get for electin' old Bill Flood governor last fall!"—Youth's Companion.

Blinders and Cold Bits.

Blinders cause constant constraint, because the horse's eyes, being on the side of his head, they compel him to look ahead, which is just as much cross eyed for him as it would be for us to look sideways. They also "act as reflectors" and throw "the sun's glare into the animal's sensitive eyes." But care should be used in taking them off horses accustomed to them. Never put a frosty bit into a horse's mouth when the temperature is below the freezing point. It inflicts acute present suffering and often permanent injury to the animal. A leather or rubber bit should be provided for such weather, or else a leather covering as smooth as possible should be put on the metal bit. A real mouthpiece can be made by any harnessmaker at a small cost.—New York Times.

Paper Air Cushions.

The Japanese employ paper instead of india rubber for making air cushions. Paper cushions roll up smaller than india rubber ones, they do not stick together after being wetted, and having no odor they are more agreeable for pillows than rubber ones. Their strength is marvelous, considering the apparent frailty of the material; a man weighing 160 pounds may stand on one without bursting it.—Chatter.

An obstinate farmer in New Jersey who refused to pay toll because the road was in bad condition saw his folly afterward, when, on being sued, he had to pay costs amounting to $5. The toll was a few cents.

LOOKING FOR GOLD

A Few Legends of Captain Kidd's Coin Scattered Along Shark River.

BURIED TREASURE AS YET UNFOUND

A Sparsely Settled Portion of the Atlantic Coast Which Abounds in Stories of Hidden Wealth.

When Captain William Kidd, the doughty sea rover, was sent out from Plymouth, England, to rid the sea of some of the pirates which infested it, he and his crew came to the conclusion that it was better to be the hunted than the hunters. They probably arrived at this unique determination from observing the case with which the fast flying schooners of the buccaneers evaded them and from catching glimpses of the many golden doubloons in the pockets of the black browed, red handkerchiefed gentry who cut throats on the high seas. They chose between small pay and hard fighting as sea police and unlimited rum and fat merchantmen prizes as sea robbers. They turned pirates.

While the sun shone on the scene of Captain Kidd's deeds of piratical valor he and his crew made hay. He was popularly supposed to have buried treasure in several hundred places along the Atlantic coast, though there has been only one recorded find of the treasure, which was that of Bellomont, governor of the colony on Gardiner's island.

Money hill is a small promontory jutting out into Shark river. No houses are near it, and the approaches to it by land are guarded by tangled masses of briar reenforced by a thick growth of scrub oak. Three miles to the eastward can be seen the shingled roofs of Avon-by-the-Sea, and Belmar, lying among the trees on either side of Shark river inlet. So lonely is Money hill that even the joyous owner of clams to bake and the hilarious possessor of bottled beer seldom invades its quiet, and the little cedars grow their blue berries without danger from the grasping white hand of the summer girl.

But here is where the native of the pines, the man who knoweth not the razor nor grammar, nor the almighty dollar, held high carnival with pick and shovel. Living in the sands, with only the huckleberries and pine cones for company, his soul was filled with eagerness over the story that a man had told his great-grandfather, who had passed it down the generations until it arrived to harrow the erstwhile happy possessor of a small watermelon patch and cornstalks that could be counted.

WHAT ONE MAN SAW.

The stories say that men used to see, in the days long ago, when the inlet was a broad, deep bay, a low black schooner standing off and on at the mouth of the inlet. At nightfall she would run into the river, but at daybreak she would disappear. A fisherman once, returning to his home at night along a lonely path which wound through the woods near Money hill, was startled by seeing a schooner at anchor a few hundred yards from the shore and a boat full of men coming toward the beach. The terror stricken young ancestor of some of the present families of the pines threw himself on the ground and prayed very earnestly, for in those days no ships would venture into the lonely inlet at dead of night except pirates, he thought, for they were the only ones supposed to know the channel except the few fishermen.

He saw a dozen bead eyed and brawny men, with heads covered with red caps, clamber from the boat. By the aid of a feeble glare from a lantern some of them began to dig. Others handed huge boxes from the boat, which appeared from their motions to be heavy. Flat on the ground, the shivering fisherman watched them as they worked, with the dim light glimmering on their silvered buckles on belt and shoe, and making the red of their garments look like blood.

He tried to crawl away noiselessly, for he was suffering from a powerful trembling that shook his frame, but, alas, the usual twig snapped under him. As he glanced over his shoulder he saw twenty pairs of fierce dark eyes turned in his direction. He gulped his heart back into its place and bounded wildly down the path.

As he afterward, gray haired and infirm, sat in the chimney corner, he told his grandchildren that there followed him curses in six different languages down the forest pathway.

STORIES OF THE SEEKERS.

Then came the time of the treasure finders. Wild rumors have swept over the pines at different times of certain families growing suddenly and mysteriously wealthy. They were said to use very old fashioned coins in buying. The name of Captain Kidd became a household word, and it was the universal belief that he had buried fabulous amounts on Money hill.

Stories such as this flew and do still fly among the new timbers at barn raisings and around the smoked hams of the grocery stores. They sound in the ears of the sand pounder and make him smile with blissful anticipation. It becomes his ambition to dig and find treasure. Let his wife dream of a new dress with beads on it, or of a wheelbarrow with gold handles, and he hitches up his trousers, shoulders his spade and sets out for Money hill.

Let him see the new moon over his shoulder (some prefer the right, some the left), and he does likewise. They have tried divining rods and all manner of uncanny spells. They have generally chosen the weird hour of a winter's midnight in which to overturn the frozen earth on the hill. Every truly ambitious resident of the pines possesses a dream book and it is startling to find how few times one can dream without dreaming of something that points to the sudden acquisition of wealth according to the books. Some have been known always to sleep with new potatoes under their pillows. One man, they claim, regularly retires to rest with an ear full of pumpkin seeds. They believe that by means of the potatoes and pumpkin seeds they will one day be inspired and will know at once where to go for the coveted Spanish dollars and gems of the famous Kidd.—Cor. New York Tribune.

A man once advertised that for five shillings he would give any author an idea for his book that would enable him to dispose of his first edition in a week. He received several sums of five shillings each, and none of the authors ever denied that he had fulfilled his promise. He advised that the word "gratis" should be stamped on every cover.

Many think that sleep is lost time. But the style of your work will be mightily affected by the style of your slumber. Sound Asleep is the sister of Wide Awake. Sleep is not a subtraction. It is an addition.

THE MAN WITH A FAILING.

His Efforts to Relieve the Intense Anxiety Were Not Appreciated.

It was 10:30 o'clock at night, and the rain and wind and darkness made it a wild one, when the train suddenly came to a halt. Some one had swung a lantern on the track about a quarter of a mile from the bridge spanning Shady creek. Those of us who turned out to learn what was up saw a farmer-looking man come back to the smoking car with the conductor, and when in out of the storm the latter asked:

"Now, then, you say there's trouble ahead. What is it? Talk fast, for I am now twelve minutes behind time."

The man was about forty years old, dressed in coarse clothing and was wet to the skin. The lantern was an old fashioned one, made of tin, and the light was furnished by a piece of candle about three inches long.

"Look a-here, gineral," he replied to the conductor in a nervous way, "go sorter slow on me or I can't tell yo' the story."

"What do you mean?"

"I've—I've got a failin. If yo' git me excited I'll stut-stut-stutter till yo' can't understand a word I say."

"Very well; you stopped us?"

"Yes; I felt called to do it. Hold on, now! Don't push me!"

"I'll give you time. You live near here, don't you?"

"Right up by the branch thar'. Lived thar' goin on twenty years. Keep cool, gineral, and don't git me narvous. I'm a-doin all right so fur."

"Well, you felt called upon to stop us?"

"I did. It's been rainin purty steady fur about a week."

"Yes."

"The branch has jest been a-humpin of herself fur the last two days."

"Yes, the water has been rising."

"Hold on, gineral! Don't chip in too fast. I'm a-holdin of myself as hard as I kin, but I feel my tongue wobblin around. This noon I seen the water risin mighty fast and I felt it my duty to watch it. I went up agin about dark and then agin an hour ago. I knowed when you was due here, and"——

"And you stopped us. Good heavens, man! but the bridge is gone!"

"Hold on, gineral! You are goin too fast! I t-t-told you if you g-g-got me ex-ex"——

"Take it easy," replied the conductor. "Just think what you want to say and then speak very slow. Great lands! but what an escape!"

"Gineral, I reckoned yo'd worry about the bridge."

"Yes, I've been very anxious about it."

"Yo' knowed the water was risin way up."

"Yes."

"I told the old woman you'd worry about it, and that I'd best git the lantern and stop the t-t-train a-a-and t-t-tell—tell"——

"Take it easy, man, there's no hurry. You got your lantern and stopped the train to tell us that the bridge had been floated off by the freshet. I understand and I can promise you"——

"Gineral!"

"Yes."

"The bridge is all right! I reckoned yo'd worry over it, and so I got the lantern and stopped the train to tell you that the water had gone down four feet and the bridge hadn't suffered a ha'r!"

I don't remember all the conductor said when he got at the facts, nor how many passengers helped throw the man down among the bushes, but when the train moved on he was banging the old tin lantern around and calling:

"G-G-Gineral, I'll be h-h-hanged if I don't see this old r-r-road in T-T-Texas before I ever do it another fa-fa-favor!"—New York World.

Gladstone at a Picnic.

Gladstone's daily life at home is a model of simplicity and regularity, and the great secret of the vast amount of work he accomplishes lies in the fact that every odd five minutes is occupied. No man ever had a deeper sense of the preciousness of time and the responsibility which every one incurs by the use or misuse he makes of it. To such a length does he carry this that at a picnic to a favorite Welch mountain he has been seen to fling himself on the heather, and bury himself in some pamphlet upon a question of the day until called to lighter things by those who were responsible for the provision basket.—Young Man.

Kinds of Toothache.

For ordinary nervous toothache, which is caused by the nervous system being out of order or by excessive fatigue, a very hot bath will so soothe the nerves that sleep will naturally follow and upon getting up the patient will feel very much refreshed and the toothache will be a thing of the past. For what is known as "jumping toothache," hot dry flannel applied to the face and neck is very effective. For common toothache, which is caused by indigestion or by strong sweet, acid or anything very hot or cold in a decayed tooth, a little piece of cotton steeped in strong camphor or oil of cloves is the best remedy.—London Tit-Bits.

The "Big Dipper."

In astronomy the "Big Dipper," so called, is in the constellation of Ursa Major, or the Great Bear. The stars forming the tail of the bear also form the handle of the dipper. The first star in the handle is Benetnasch; the second, Mizar; the third, Alioth. The other four, which go to form the bowl of the dipper, are Megres, Phad, Merak and Dudhe. The two last named are called "The Pointers," because they point or guide the eye to the pole star, which is distant 29 degs. The top bowl stars are 10 degs. and the bottom ones 8 degs. apart.—St. Louis Republic.

UP IN THE CLOUDS

Some Wonderful Feats of Railway Construction and Operation.

MOUNTAIN CLIMBING MADE EASY.

Work That Would Have Been Deemed Impossible a Few Years Ago.—A Road of Tunnels.

If George Stevenson, when he placed the first locomotive on the track and guaranteed it a speed of six miles an hour, could have foreseen that in less than eighty years the successors of his rude machine would be climbing the sides of mountain ranges, piercing gorges hitherto deemed inaccessible, crossing ravines on bridges higher than the dome of St. Paul's, and traversing the bowels of the earth by means of tunnels, no doubt his big blue eyes would have stood out with wonder and amazement. But he foresaw nothing of the kind; the only problem present in his mind was how to get goods from the seaports in western England to London as easily and cheaply as possible, and to do this he substituted for horses, which had for 150 years been drawing cars along wooden or iron tracks, the wonderful machine which has revolutionized the freight and passenger traffic of the world.

It was, indeed, impossible for any one to foresee the triumphs of engineering which have accompanied the advances in transportation. To the engineer of the present day there are no impossibilities. The engineer is a wizard at whose command space and matter are annihilated. The highest mountain, the deepest valley has no terrors for him; he can bridge the latter and encircle or tunnel the former.

Hence the need of railroad communication has caused lines to be constructed through districts where only a few years ago the thing would have been deemed impossible. The Pacific roads of this country were a necessity long before their construction, and in the face of difficulties almost insuperable were carried to successful completion. So also of the railroads in the Andes of South America. The famous road from Callao through the heart of Peru is one of the highest mountain roads in the world, as well as the most difficult of construction. The grades are often of 300 feet and more to the mile, and when the mountains were reached so great were the difficulties the engineers were forced to confront that in some places laborers were lowered from cliffs by ropes in order that, with toil and difficulty, they might carve a foothold in order to begin the cutting for the roadway.

In some sections tunnels are more numerous than open cuts, and so far as the road has gone sixty-one tunnels, great and small, have been constructed, aggregating over 20,000 feet in length. The road attains a height of 15,000 feet above the level of the sea, and at the highest point of the track is about as high as the topmost peak of Mont Blanc. It pierces the range above it by a tunnel 3,847 feet long. The stern necessities of business compelled the construction of this road, otherwise it never would have been begun.

The tunnels of the Andes, however, do not bear comparison with the tunnels, bridges and snowsheds of the Union Pacific, nor do even these compare with the vast undertakings in the Alps—three great tunnels of nine to eleven miles in length, which have been prepared for the transit of travelers and freight. The requirements of business necessitated the piercing of the Alps, and as soon as the necessity was shown funds in abundance were forthcoming for the enterprise.

But tunneling a mountain is a different thing from climbing it. Many years ago the attention of inventors was directed to the practicability of constructing a railroad up the side of a mountain on grades which, to an ordinary engine, were quite impossible. The improvements in locomotives twenty-five and thirty years ago rendered them capable of climbing grades which, in the early days of railroad engineering, were deemed out of the question. These improvements proved a serious stumbling block in the way of the inventors, who found that an ordinary locomotive was able to climb a much steeper grade than was commonly supposed. The first railroads were laid almost level, but it was soon discovered that a grade of a few feet to the mile was no impediment to progress, and gradually the grade was steepened. The inventors of mountain railroad transportation might have been discouraged by this discovery, but it is a characteristic of an inventor that he is not set back by opposition, which, in fact, only serves to stimulate his zeal.

The projectors of inclined roads and mountain engines kept steadily on, and in France, Germany, England and the United States many experimental roads were constructed, each of a few hundred yards in length, and locomotive models were built and put in motion to the amazement of the general public, who jeered alike at the contrivances and the contrivers, deeming the former impracticable and the latter crazy.

But the idea of building a road up the side of a hill was not to be dismissed. There was money in it for the successful man, so the cranky inventor kept on at work in spite of the jeers of the rabble and the discouragements of capitalists loath to invest their money in an uncertain scheme. To the energy and perseverance of railroad inventors the success of the mountain railroad is due, as also is the construction of the various mountain roads, of which the road up Mount Washington, finished in 1868, was the first, and the road up Pike's Peak was the latest.

Of all the mountain roads which have been constructed since the one up Mount Washington was finished, the best known is that which ascends the world famous Rigi. With the exception of Mount Blanc, Rigi is perhaps the best known of any peak in the Alps, though it is by no means the highest, its summit being but 5,905 feet above the level of the sea. Although scarcely more than a third of the height of some other mountains in the Alps, it seems much higher because of its isolated position.

The Mount Rigi railway begins at Vitznau, on Lake Lucerne, and extends to the border of the canton and almost to the top of the mountain. It is 19,000 feet long, and during that distance rises 4,000 feet, at an average grade of one foot in four. Though steep, it is by no means so much so as the Mount Washington road, which rises 5,285 feet above the sea, at an average of one foot in three. There are, however, stretches of the Rigi road at which the grade is about one foot in two and a half, which is believed to be the steepest in the world.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Table linen should be hemmed by hand. Not only does it look more dainty, but there is never a streak of fire under the edge after being laundered as with machine sewing.

INDEPENDENCE, CAL.

FRIDAY, JULY 8 1892

The man with a patch of alfalfa and a bunch of cattle is abou as far removed from "carking care" as pilgrims through this vale of tears ever get.

Carnegie has over 40,000 men in his employ, and he threatens to throw them all out of employment if they do not submit to a heavy reduction of wages. In a few years Carnegie has accumulated wealth estimated at thirty-five millions of dollars. It is the rule that getting such vast wealth in a short time increases greed instead of satisfying it, and in order to add to millions he cannot use, Carnegie proposes to grind more out of poor working men.

The press of San Francisco, Republican and Democratic, united in exposing and denouncing the corruption evident in the selection of a location for a Post Office. It was shown by competent authority that there is a clear steal of not less than $100,000 in the price to be paid for the ground. In the face of all this the government officials have forced the location upon the people, and now will follow a demand for five or six millions of dollars for a building. Corruption and thievery growing bolder and more shameless every day, appear to reign in every branch of the government.

No better illustration of the effect of high tariff could be given than is now afforded by Carnegie. He and his kind first secure high import duties under the plea of maintaining high wages for American workmen. When the law is established they reduce wages so that the workmen strike, and then their places are filled with cheap labor from Europe. The so called "protection" benefits none but the rich monopolists, and they gain in two ways. They are able to reduce the pay of workmen and increase the cost of products to the farmers and all other home consumers.

Every one of the older settlers of Owens Valley knows that it is now harder to get a dollar than it formerly was to get ten. In every part of the State the same tightening financial pinch is felt. Corporations are sapping the life out of the State, and an exchange tells the truth in saying it will be impossible for us to secure reforms of the abuses which are fast destroying the prosperity of the State, unless we stamp out the use of corrupt office holders who work in the interest of a corporation, the managers of which appear to have no idea that plundering the people is not perfectly legitimate.

The free coinage bill passed by the Senate looks very much like a political trick and not honest legislation. The Republicans have a majority in the Senate while the Democrats have a majority in the other House. The bill just passed would go to the bottom of the file and be preceded by hundreds of other bills, all of which in the regular order must be acted upon before the silver bill from the Senate could be reached. The chances are not one in a million that half of these bills will be acted upon before Congress adjourns, when all remaining on the file will be dead, the silver bill among the rest. This would enable the Republican party to go before the people as the friends of silver coinage and the Democrats as opposed to it. Senator Felton of our own State voted against the bill.

The prohibitionists have chosen a candidate for the Presidency who would do honor to any party. John Bidwell is one of the noblest pioneers that ever came to California. About 1844, being then a very young man, he came to the Pacific Coast. His whole life since has been manly, upright and honorable. When land could be had for taking he settled upon a tract in Butte county and has always since been engaged in farming. He has very large orchards, and gives employment to many people, and no man is more respected and liked by all who work for him. His home is one of the most beautiful in the State, and there are no locked gates upon the grounds. Every one is at liberty to enter and walk about where they please. Mrs. Bidwell is as plain and kind in manner as her husband. She is a fine scholar, familiar with French and other languages. No girl working for her living could dress more plainly, yet her simple dignity would grace a palace. There are no better examples of what Americans should be than General John Bidwell and his wife.

HOW TO VOTE.

THE NEW BALLOT LAW AND HOW TO USE IT.

Text of the Law and Explanatory Cuts and Sample Ticket—The Law Said to Be Safe Against Repeaters and Vote Buyers—Read It Over and File the Paper Away for Reference.

The new Australian ballot law is now in force in this state, and every voter is interested in knowing how to comply with the law in casting his ballot.

A few municipal elections have been conducted under the new plan, and others are yet to be held before the final test of the law is to be made at the fall general election. To assist voters to a proper understanding of the way to do it, we print herewith the full text of the law and illustrations of the voting booths.

Cut No. 2 shows the position of the ballot clerks, voters in the stalls, and the officers of election checking the voters as they deposit the ballots in the box near the exit. Enter with the man to the right of the cut, and get a ballot from the gentleman standing at the end of the table, provided the young man at the desk finds your name properly registered in the great register open before him.

Then walk over to one of the open stalls and mark your ballot in accordance with your wishes, and pass in front of the group at the left, and announce your name to the judges of election. When the young man sitting at the desk finds your name properly registered, you are permitted to deposit the ballot in the box and pass out. That is all there is to it. Cut No. 3 shows the ground plan of Cut No. 2, with the positions of each election officer and voter indicated.

It has been claimed by some that the new law can be beaten, and that vote buying cannot be prevented by the experiment. The following editorial from the San Francisco Examiner seems to state the case about as fairly as it can be done:

"A correspondent of the Examiner warned the California electors of the method by which the Australian ballot system was beaten in Montana. It was a variation of the 'Tasmania dodge,' a voter being bribed to bring out a ballot by substituting a piece of blank paper for the official ballot that was given him on entering the booth. In the 'Tasmania dodge' the voter was supposed to vote the blank paper, in the Montana case to tear it up. The official ballot being brought outside it was filled up by the vote buyer, given to the next voter, who cast the marked ballot and brought out a fresh official ballot. The system was thus made a check on the bribed voter.

"Whether this trick was actually worked or not in the case mentioned, it is amply provided for in the California law. In the first place the voter is forbidden to leave the booth until he has delivered up the ballot he has received on entering. He must give it to the inspector if he wishes to vote it or return it to the ballot clerks in case he does not.

"But a second check, still more valuable, prevents any illicit use of the ballot even if it is taken outside. When the voter enters the booth the ballot clerks mark the check number of his ballot against his name on the printed register. When he marks the ballot he folds it with the counterfoil or tag that bears the number of the ballot exposed, and delivers the ballot to the inspector. The inspector announces the name and number, the ballot clerks verify it from their record, and the inspector tears off the tag and drops the ballot in the box. If the ballot does not bear the same number as the one he received from the ballot clerks he cannot vote.

"The California ballot system cannot be 'beaten' in this manner except by the collusion of the election officers, challengers and watchers of both parties. It is hardly possible to secure so large a number of corrupt men together, or at all events men corrupted by the same side. Whatever vote buying is done under the system will have to be carried out under the 'assistance to illiterates" provision. This will be a possible but dangerous game to play. It will require the collusion of election officers, and will be readily detected by the watchers. The November election will show whether an amendment on this point will be necessary."

The sample ballot given is intended to show how to mark votes. If a straight ticket is voted, an X in the space at the right of the party for which the voter desires to cast his ballot is sufficient. But a split ticket requires an X opposite each name voted for. Only one office is on this ticket. All are arranged in the same manner.

VULGARITY IN DESIGN.

Jewelry, Furniture and Bric-a-Brac That Shock the Æsthete.

There is nothing in modern life more discouraging to the person of taste than the deliberate vulgarity in design which is so conspicuous in modern manufactures, and this is especially true in those matters of adornment or luxury where it would be supposed that if anywhere would be found the evidences of refinement and cultivation. If in the articles with which the dwellings and the persons of the rich are adorned one does not find evidences of good taste it is indeed a discouraging outlook for the seeker, and yet it is in precisely in these things that the most flagrant violations of all æsthetic canons are encouraged.

One has but to consider the tricks of the makers of jewelry to understand the extent to which this evil has gone. The last whim of the makers of slang is to be seen in the windows of the jeweler wrought out in precious stones. Now the art of the cunning goldsmith is devoted to the making of pigs in gold and gems, now it is some other beast equally inartistic, again it is some idiotic pun, which is enshrined in costly stones or rich enamel, and yet again the paraphernalia of the turf, the gaming table, or what not, absorbs the best skill which the modern world can show in this line. Even worse are the coarse and vulgar designs which are to be seen in the cases of respectable jewelers of the feminine leg or foot, the suggestive and semi-indecent ornaments which appeal to the taste of certain classes, not only of men, but of women, who are apparently perfectly proper members of society.

The designs of furniture and bric-a-brac are, if anything, worse. It is true that there are good designs to be found, but it is no less true that the reign of cheap vulgarity is at its triumphant height. The hard and unsympathetic execution of mechanical means which would be tolerable only when directed by the most delicate and sympathetic taste is made the more detestable by the coarse and forced manner in which it is used. When the designer goes to the past to purloin a design, if he wishes to hit the popular taste he selects some rococo motive of the worst period, and as a rule it is popular in direct proportion to its worthlessness.

When one compares the ornaments of today with those of the times of our grandfathers he may well ask whether our grandchildren will have as much reason to respect their heirlooms as we have to look with pride upon ours. If one takes the so called souvenir spoons with which the shop windows have been filled, how many of them are even tolerable in design?

It is always easier to find fault than to find out a remedy, and it is undoubtedly true that in the present case the matter is largely the result of the increase of material prosperity among those classes where neither taste nor intelligence has had time to be developed. The markets are controlled to a great extent by the new rich, and it is not unnatural that the impress of their vulgarity should be left in a broad mark upon the arts of the time. It is no less true abroad, however, than it is in this country that the designers have apparently degenerated, and the explanation given does not so well apply abroad as in this country.

No doubt the taste of the world is being educated, but the problem today is to educate the taste of the many instead of the taste of the few, and it is far more difficult than any which has ever been presented to the devotees of the æsthetic in the history of civilization before.—Boston Courier.

Children's Play in Germany.

It is a common belief at the present time in south Germany that if children play soldiers very often in the street there is a war coming, and if they play "funeral" an epidemic will come over the land and many deaths will result. The relator of this tells that, when a boy, he with others played "funeral" in front of the house of an old miser in his native town in Germany. The miser became much excited and exclaimed, "I will not die yet!" and made complaint to the mayor that the boys should be arrested and punished.—Philadelphia Times.

FOR PRESIDENT,

GROVER CLEVELAND,

OF NEW YORK.

FOR VICE-PRESIDENT,

GEN. STEVENSON,

OF ILLINOIS.

G. H. Palmer of Lone Pine was in town yesterday.

W. K. Miller was in town a couple of days this week.

J. G. Dodge of Lone Pine was in town on Wednesday.

T. C. Boland and John Morton came up from Keeler yesterday.

New potatoes are getting plentiful. Prices are still very high, though.

The Democratic County Central Committee meet next Saturday.

F. McIver spent the Fourth at Carson, where a grand celebration was had.

Don't fail to attend the sale of personal property at Mairs' stable to-morrow.

A. C. Harvey, the popular Lone Pine stage man, was in town this morning.

Mrs. G. L. Drake and Miss Ritta Drake came down from Bishop on Wednesday.

On another page will be found full instructions to voters under the new Australian ballot law.

Under-Sheriff Holland started out about nine o'clock last night on the track of Charley Hedges.

Two big teams are kept constantly employed hauling borax from Saline to Big Pine.

Misses Stella and Adaline Meysan of Lone Pine visited Independence during the week.

The Board of Supervisors and Board of Equalization have been in session during the week.

Mrs. N. Rhine arrived at Independence last Monday from San Francisco. She expects to remain here.

A. H. Allen spent several days in town this week. He came down to attend the meeting of Fair Directors to be held to-night.

T. F. A. Connelly and Johnny Underwood came down from Bishop this morning to attend the meeting of Fair Directors to be held to-day.

Miss Elsie and Master Julian Eibeshutz Miss Hulda Harris and Miss Ettie Wood started for San Francisco yesterday. The summer term of school opens next Monday.

At a meeting of the Directors of the Track Association held on Tuesday evening it was decided to build a first-class oval track to use this year as there is not sufficient time to construct a kite track. Work will probably be commenced next week.

A new stage station has been put up at Little Lake, on the Keeler and Mojave stage route. It is a very long drive from Indian Wells to Haiwai and this station being midway between those two points it considerably shortens the time on the entire trip.

There is a fine crop of fruit in the orchard of John Baxter at Independence. Apple and peach trees are heavily loaded and the fruit is excellent. Some days ago Mr. Baxter gathered two tons of comb honey from his bees; it is all in one pound sections and is as white as the finest bread. There is demand for this honey as fast as it can be supplied.

In a recent letter to the proprietors, Mr. H. M. Bangs, the druggist at Chatsworth, Ill., says: "I am very much pleased with Chamberlain's Cough Remedy. During the epidemic of la grippe here it took the lead and was very much better liked than other cough medicines." The grip requires precisely the same treatment as a very severe cold, for which this remedy is so efficient. It will promptly loosen a cold and relieve the lungs, soon effecting a cure, while most other medicines in common use for colds only give temporary relief; 50 cent bottles for sale by Claim of County Assessor for deputy and other services allowed in sum of $299.95.

The Fourth at Big Pine.

Early on Sunday morning people began to arrive in Big Pine to participate in the Fourth of July celebration. At dawn on the Fourth the firing of salutes heralded the anniversary of the Nation's birth. The Independence Silver Cornet Band was present and discoursed inspiring national airs. At 10 o'clock a. m. a large concourse of citizens met in Uhlemeyer's grove to listen to the exercises. A large platform had been erected and on it were seated the Officers of the Day, Choir, Band of Hope, reporters and representative citizens. The musical exercises and recitations were in good taste and well rendered. The oration was delivered by Emmons Spencer Esq., and we deeply regret that lack of space prevents the reproduction of it in full at this time. The speech differed materially from the ordinary hackneyed Fourth of July harangues. The orator spoke of the noble deeds and fearless righteousness of our revolutionary sires, stirred up the latent feeling of patriotism in every bosom in his audience by recalling the brave deeds of the heroes of 1812, and then spoke at length upon the momentous questions of the day. The frequent applause that greeted him showed that he was in touch with his hearers and served as a strong indication of the drift of popular sentiment. After the exercises tables were spread with every variety of good things to eat, with plenty of iced lemonade to wash it down. Visitors were treated with the utmost hospitality, and Big Pine did itself proud. The afternoon was filled up with music by the band, a horse race and other amusements. In the evening a fine display of fireworks made the exquisite summer night wierdly glorious; and was particularly interesting to the children, to many of whom it was something before unseen. The ball followed in Williams' new hall which was nicely decorated with evergreens and Chinese lanterns for the occasion. The pleasure in dancing was only exceeded by the excellent supper given at the Big Pine Hotel. Throughout the entire affair the people of Big Pine were continually alert to please and entertain their visitors. Everybody was made cordially welcome and the recollections of the day will always be most pleasant.

Stole an Outfit

Some time after midnight on the morning of the fifth Charley Hedges, well known here and at Bishop, stole a horse belonging to H. Levy together with blankets and a revolver, and a saddle and brille and picket rope belonging to Irv. H. Mulholland and levanted for parts unknown. Under-sheriff Holland started to look for him on Wednesday, going south. On Wednesday evening Arthur Nobles came down from Onion Valley and stated that Hedges had camped there Tuesday night and left for Kings river next morning. Sheriff Gorman immediately deputized Charley Robinson and he started out about eleven o'clock at night with instructions to follow Hedges till he caught him. It is quite likely that Robinson will capture him before reaches a railroad town.

Deputy Sheriff Chas. Robinson captured Hedges on Kings River and arrived in town at noon to-day with his prisoner.

A Painful Accident.

One of those numerous and unfortunate accidents which will happen occurred at Independence on the Fourth. A crowd of little boys were playing in Murphy's blacksmith shop when one of them accidentally ignited some powder that had been spilled when firing salutes early in the morning. Julian Eibeshutz was slightly burned and his little brother Eddie received severe injuries. The little fellow was standing right over a pasteboard box containing some powder and the explosion which followed set fire to his clothing. His face and body above the waist was badly burned. A physician was at once called in and he is now doing nicely. Beyond being exceedingly painful the injuries are not considered serious.

Chamberlain's Colic, Cholera and Diarrhœa Remedy is the standard. Its many cures have won it praise from Maine to California. Every family and every traveler should be provided with it at all times. No other remedy can take its place or do its work. 25 and 50 cent bottles for sale by

LOVE'S CHANGES.

Has summer come without the rose,
Or left the bird behind?
Is the blue changed above thee,
O world, or am I blind?
Will you change every flower that grows,
Or only change this spot—
Where she who said: "I love thee"
Now says: "I love thee not?"

The skies seemed true above thee;
The rose true on the tree;
The bird seemed true the summer through;
But all proved false to me.
World, is there one good thing in you—
Life, love, or death—or what?
Since lips that sang "I love thee"
Have said: "I love thee not?"

I think the sun's kiss will scarce fall
Into one flower's gold cup;
I think the bird will miss me,
And give the summer up.
O sweet place, desolate in tall
Wild grass, have you forgot
How her lips loved to kiss me,
Now that they kiss me not?

Be false or fair above me;
Come back with any face,
Summer; do I care what you do?
You cannot change one place—
The grass, the leaves, the earth, the dew—
The grave I make the spot,
Here where she used to love me,
Here where she loves me not.
—Arthur O'Shaugnessy.

An Interrupted Prayer.

Some seventy years ago, when a menagerie was almost a thing unknown, and a solitary wild beast was now and then carried about the country for exhibition, a certain New England village was thrown into great commotion by the news that an elephant was to be exhibited in a neighboring town. The village which is the scene of my story was not large enough to induce his exhibitors to make any stay there, but his road lay through it. Now an elephant could not be packed away or in any manner be kept out of sight. His journey must be made in full view, and everybody could get a look at him, and everybody was excited accordingly. Day after day passed—no elephant.

The exhibition had been advertised for a Monday, and Saturday night had come, with no tidings of the famous traveler. Sunday morning! The "sound of the church going bell" summoned the people. Parson Adams had begun "the long prayer" and the congregation stood devoutly attentive to all appearance. But there was at least one exception, for Dr. Dobson's pew, near an open window, commanded a view of the highway, and Dr. Dobson's eyes, wide open, were fixed upon the prospect. A cloud of dust arose—then slowly above the hill opposite the window the head of a huge beast came into sight. The eager doctor forgot time and place, and shouting, "The elephant's coming! there he is!" he was out of the window like a dart. Off rushed the congregation, and whether Parson Adams finished his prayer tradition has not told.—Wide Awake.

One Young Man's Bad Break.

I try to keep fairly up with the new books of the day, and though I don't want to be pedantic I occasionally speak of a new one that has pleased me. But I rarely find a young man who knows even the names. A few nights ago I entertained a young fellow who is, I am told, considered very clever in Wall street. He is a college bred man, one from whom one might be justified in expecting fair average information on literary matters. But in college he had gone in for athletics, he said, and since that time he had been swallowed up in business, and when I spoke of some new writers he plumply professed his ignorance even of their names. Well, I could have forgiven that; it's so hard to keep up nowadays. But when I spoke of Hawthorne; dear old Hawthorne, and he responded with enthusiasm that he had read him—read "The Red Letter A"—I made up my mind that he was unforgivable.—Interview in New York Evening Sun.

Hoist with His Own Petard.

A stranger when dining at the hotel was accosted by a detective, who said to him: "Beg your pardon, we are in search of an escaped convict, and as a matter of form you will oblige us by showing your passport."

"Do I look like a convict?"

"Possibly not. In any case I shall require to see your passport."

The stranger, feeling annoyed, presented the officer with the bill of fare, and the latter began to read:

"Sheep's head; neck of mutton; pig's feet." * * *

"Very good!" he observed; "the description tallies; you will please come along with us."—Gazette Piemontese.

French poets have frequently compared a man's existence to a lighted pipe, whose contents pass off in smoke and ashes. In an old volume of the Eighteenth century, entitled "Morale de Guerard," there is an engraving representing a young man smoking a clay pipe, and the legend calls him the "Universal Portrait." This is followed by a queer old piece of poetry comparing everybody to a lighted pipe.

"What were you about to remark?" said one man to another. "Nothing." "But you looked as if you had something to say." "Yes, I'm very deceptive that way. I've often thought myself that I had something to say, and discovered after I had said it that I hadn't."

Instead of paying the clergyman a cash fee the bridegroom the other day presented to the divine who officiated a set of vestments and an ecclesiastical ring engraved on the inside to commemorate the occasion.

John Tracy had stolen fifty horses in his time and was writing a book about it in Kansas City when he was arrested and locked up. And thus is literary endeavor rewarded.

BOUCICAULT'S "PHANTOM."

A Play That Horrified Washingtonians During the War Times.

"Perhaps the most remarkable play that Boucicault ever wrote was produced on the stage of a Washington theatre," said that veteran in affairs of the stage, Mr. Lloyd Moxley. "It was the drama called 'The Phantom,' and the great dramatist had the title role. At that time Boucicault had but recently opened what was known as the Washington theatre, which occupied the building where the Theatre Comique now is. That was in the year 1861. The building was rented from Louis Carusi, and was fittted up in a manner calculated to astonish the natives at that period. No theatre in Washington up to that time had ever known such gorgeousness. The auditorium was upholstered and the walls hung with satin and purple and cardinal velvet.

"Mr. Boucicault presented the character of the phantom in a manner that horrified while it electrified the audience. The character of which he took the part in the piece was that of a vampire nobleman. Repeatedly killed, he always succeeded in renewing his life and diabolical usefulness by arts peculiarly his own. Whenever he was slain he would make a dying request to the friend he took care to have with him that his body should be placed that night on the mountain top, where the first rays of the coming morning's sun would strike it.

"Upon the revivifying influence of these rays the vampire depended for resuscitation. The presentment of this human nightmare by Mr. Boucicault was most horribly vivid. He appears on the stage as a sort of living corpse, bloodless and exanimate. So great was the strain of this extraordinary part upon the actor that, after it had been performed for a while in Washington, Mr. Boucicault said to his partner, Mr. Stuart: 'We must take this play off the bills. It is too much for my nerves.'"

Boucicault conducted the Washington theatre for three seasons, at the end of which he sold out his interest in the establishment. Many excellent plays were successfully produced there under his management, some of them of his own writing, and he himself appeared as an actor in several.

Mr. Harry Rapley, of the National theatre, a while ago addressed a request to Mr. Boucicault that he would give a definition of the difference between high and low comedy. The dramatist replied:

"Low comedy includes all those grotesque and humorous personages who provoke laughter by extravagance and distortion of nature. These are designed to be laughed at.

"High comedy is a delineation of the weaknesses of human beings—to provoke amusement and sympathy with light heartedness and joyous expression. It includes such personages as by their good humor provoke spectators to laugh with them, or by their weaknesses invite spectators to laugh with the author. Such is Sir Peter Teazle, also Charles Surface and Rosalind. Examples of low comedy are found in Dogberry, the grave diggers in "Hamlet" and Bob Acres.—Washington Star.

It was John H. Latrobe who acted as counsel for the Winans brothers in their railroad contracts with the Russian government, and I heard the other day the story of how he was engaged by them. He was in Europe at the time for his health, when he met one of the Winans brothers and was asked by him to go to Russia. "I can't go, and you can't afford to pay me what it is worth." "But you must go," said Winans. "We have got to make a big contract and we need a man we can trust. We will pay you any price you want. What will you charge?"

"I don't want to go," answered Mr. Latrobe, "but if I do go I will have to charge $60,000." "All right," said Mr. Winans, and, as Governor Curtin tells the story, he thereupon took out his checkbook and wrote him out a check for the amount. The result was that Latrobe drew up the contract with the government, and by this secured the control of the road for twenty-five years. It was an expensive piece of business, but they made millions out of it.—Frank G. Carpenter.

"Board That Bark!"

An amusing incident occurred on the Philadelphia off Clifton, S. I., one day. A German bark, anchored near by, tripped her anchor and floated down upon the war ship. "Board that bark!" shouted the officer of the deck. Never was an order obeyed with greater alacrity. All hands went over the rail like so many streaks. In an instant the bark's yards were alive with bluejackets, sail was set to royals, and away went the German to a clear anchorage. The skipper was very much frightened at first, but very grateful when he realized the work done by his suddenly reinforced crew.

MEN OF SAN FRANCISCO.

THEIR WORDS ARE BEYOND QUESTION.

Some most Remarkable Declarations Made by Well-Known Men Concerning Their Own Experience.

There has been a very great deal of interest in San Francisco and vicinity within the past few days over certain wonderful statements made by well known gentlemen which have appeared in the newspapers. It is easy to make an assertion; it is not so easy to prove it. The facts which follow are from well known gentlemen of San Francisco and their statements are beyond question. They can be read with great interest and profit.

Mr. Henry Wilson, 12 Union street, said: "For three years prior to 1885 I was fearfully troubled with inflammatory rheumatism. I tried various so-called remedies but got no relief. A friend finally advised me to use Warner's Safe Cure and Safe Rheumatic Cure, taking them on alternate weeks. I bought the remedies and took them faithfully according to directions, with the result that I was completely restored to health, and have not been troubled with rheumatism since."

Mr. William Wallace of 56 Clay St., suffered for six years from Kidney trouble, which threatened to develop into a most serious disorder. In speaking of his restoration to health he said: "I found almost immediate relief when I commenced to use Warner's Safe Cure. The pain left me, I gained flesh and strength and was soon a well man. My cure was effected four years ago and I have had no return of the trouble since."

Mr. W. Potter, 519 Third street said: "I was entirely cured of Nervous Dyspepsia and biliousness by the use of Warner's Safe Cure."

Police officer, M. O. Anderson, who belongs to the Southern Station, and whose beat is on Market street, between 1st and 4th streets, was not always the robust man he looks to be to-day. In course of conversation he said: "About seven years ago I had an attack of kidney trouble accompanied by a bearing down sensation in the loins and a feeling of weakness across the hips and small of the back. Warner's Safe Cure was recommended to me and I took about half a dozen bottles which with the pills completely relieved me. About three years afterwards I had another attack but it yielded readily to the Safe Cure. I thoroughly believe in the medicine and consider it a good thing to take each spring to cleanse and build up the system."

Mr. W. J. Renwick of 445 Bryant St., is an engineer who formerly had charge of a dummy engine at the Pacific Mail Docks. He related a very interesting experience. He said: "I used to run a little dummy engine that drew the cars from the yard here to the steamers. It was a little thing as it had to go under the sheds and had no springs. Half way over the tracks across another line and at each trip one was jolted terribly. I used to do one hundred trips a day at least and it used me up. The action of my kidneys was impaired and the poison in my blood affected my head till I was nearly crazy and had to quit work. I was actually afraid to stand before a large mirror or plate glass window for fear of the insane desire to break it which came over me. I took Warner's Safe Cure on my friend Capt. Marsden's recommendation and it completely cured me. But I would not go back on the dummy. The fellow who took my place was troubled in the same way and died in the asylum. To-day I am a perfectly healthy man thanks to Warner's Safe Cure and I have had no trouble for over four years." Mr. Renwick is a member of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers and a master of his trade.

Mr. B. F. Armstrong of 46 Third street said: "My wife suffered for over nine years with kidney and female troubles. I did all in my power as far as money and doctors were concerned to have her cured, but nothing I did seemed to help her or give her relief. I finally concluded to take her East, and see what could be done with her case by Eastern physicians. While on our way East, we made the acquaintance of an old gentleman, who, during our conversation in regard to my wife's health, said, "Why do you not try Warner's Safe Cure?" I said: "I have no confidence or belief in any Proprietary remedies." After reaching Binghamton, N. Y., finding she grew no better, and thinking of the gentleman on the cars account of what Warner's Safe Cure had done for him, concluded to try it. In three months' time I returned to California with my wife a well and cured woman. She has had no return of her trouble now, over four years. I keep it constantly in the house and would not be without it. I consider it the only remedy in the world for kidney and female troubles."

There can be but one conclusion from these outspoken assertions. It is that the great Safe Cure named is the most efficient and most popular preparation in America. It is also the most generally used. It owes its popularity wholly to its value. It cures when other remedies fail. Do not be persuaded into taking any cheap decoction but insist upon having Warner's Safe Cure. Where your health is concerned always take the best.—San Francisco Evening Post.

An instrument has recently been exhibited in London by which a photograph can be taken of drops of water in the course of their formation. It consists of a lantern and lenses, by which a water trough, the source of the drops, can be strongly illuminated, together with a lightning camera having a revolving dish with one perforation.

IT RESPECTS THE LAW.

The Lottery Company's Good Faith.

Washington telegram to Globe-Democrat.

The New Orleans Postmaster, Captain S. M. Eaton, is a little smooth-faced man, honest and shrewd. He is a great friend of Warmoth, but he has backed up the Postmaster-General's efforts vigorously in the fight on the lottery.

The year before the warfare began Mr. Eaton says the Lottery Company bought at the New Orleans office $103,000 worth of stamps and stamped envelopes. For that same year the total revenue of the office was $416,000. So it appears that the Lottery Company contributed within $1,000 of one-fourth of the entire revenue of the office.

By the action of the department in enforcing the anti-lottery law passed by Congress this postal revenue from the Lottery Company became a dead loss. Last year's receipts by the New Orleans office reached a total of $352,000. The day before Captain Eaton started on this conference the Lottery Company posted in all its branch offices in New Orleans a notice to this effect:

"The Supreme Court of the United States having decided the anti-lottery postal law to be constitutional, it is hereby ordered and directed that no one in the employ of this company shall mail a letter which in any way refers directly or indirectly to the business of the lottery. It must be understood that this company will aid in the enforcement of this law."

"I think that this notice is honest and sincere," said Captain Eaton, "and the Company means just what it says."

Misunderstood.

Shortly after the attempt to blow up Russell Sage, a well dressed man, with his hat tilted back on his ruffled hair and an excited look in his eyes, entered a New York art store and stalked up to the counter, behind which several clerks were standing. The man slapped his hand imperatively on the counter. "I want a quarter 'v' a million," he cried, "and I want it quick!" The clerks turned pale and stared at the stranger. A porter slid quietly to the door to get a policeman. The well dressed but excited stranger stared at the clerks in astonishment. "What the dickens is the matter with you fellows, anyhow?" he cried. "Can't I get a quarter 'v' a million without all of you having fits?" "Pray, sir, don't get excited," said a clerk, patting the man on the arm; "the porter has just gone after it. We can't get so much money in a second, you know."

The stranger looked thoughtful a moment, then laughed, and the laugh gave the clerks another unpleasant shock. "Ha! ha!" said the stranger; "I see. I see. Don't get alarmed. I merely want paint—paint, not cash. A quart of vermilion paint." The clerks recovered their self possession. "I beg your pardon," said one, "but you talked so fast that it sounded as if you had demanded a quarter of a million. We thought you meant dollars."—New York Sun.

What Tight Collars Will Do.

Dr. Forster, director of the Ophthalmic university at Breslau, has figured out a connection between tight collars and short sightedness. He alleges that in 300 cases that have come under his attention the eyesight had been affected by the pressure of such collars upon the muscles of the neck, disturbing the circulation of the blood to the head.

LEND YOUR CONSTITUTION A HAND.

Constitutions are much alike, and in nine-tenths of us the same causes produce the same effects. Vertigo, dizziness, or pain of any kind, excepting that of an injury, can come only when there is in our bodies some impurity of the blood which we have not sufficient vitality to throw off without help. Therefore, the proper thing to do is to get immediately the necessary help. No aid is so effective as BRANDRETH'S PILLS. When you feel these ills coming on take from three to ten of these pills, according to your weight, and be relieved at once. Never put off the feeling by thinking you will soon be over it. Take the pills and do not rack the constitution.

We attract hearts by the qualities we display; we retain them by the qualities we possess.

ACROSS THE DEEP, TO THE FAR WEST,

On steamboats, cars and stage-coaches, Hostetter's Stomach Bitters is carried as the most important item in the materia medica of the traveling public. It deprives vitiated, brackish water of its hurtful properties and execrable flavor, counteracts the pernicious effects upon the stomach of bad or indigestible food, remedies cramps, heartburn and wind upon the stomach. It is a fine defense against malarial disorders, nullifies the effects of excessive heat, cold and damp, relieves sick headaches, and is an incomparable cure for costiveness and billiousness. The fatigue of travel often tells most disastrously upon invalids and convalescents, occasionally to such an extent as to jeopardise life. Persons in feeble health, apprehensive of bad effects from travel, will, if provided with the Bitters, be far less likely to have their fears realized.

How can we expect another to keep our secret, when it is more than we can do ourselves?

DEAFNESS CAN'T BE CURED

by local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure Deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube gets inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed Deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

We will give One Hundred Dollars for any case of Deafness (caused by Catarrh) that we can not cure by taking Hall's Catarrh Cure. Send for circulars, free.

It's an insult to your intelligence, but some unscrupulous dealers try it. For instance: you're suffering from some Skin, Scalp or Scrofulous affection, or are feeling "run-down" and "used-up." There's a torpid liver, impure blood, and all that may come from it. You've decided, wisely, that Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery is the medicine to help you. You know that it's guaranteed to do so, as no other blood-purifier is.

If it doesn't benefit or cure, you get your money back.

But what is best for you to take isn't always best for the dealer to sell. He offers something else that's "just as good." Is it likely? If the makers of a medicine can't trust it, can you?

One of two things has to happen. You're cured of Catarrh, or you're paid $500 cash. That's what is promised by the proprietors of Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy. By its mild, soothing, cleansing, and healing properties, it cures the worst cases.

A MEETING.

Softly she came one twilight from the dead,
And in the passionate silence of her look
Was more than man has writ in any book;
And now my thoughts are restless, and a dread
Calls them to the Dim Land discomforted;
For down the leafy ways her white feet took,
Lightly the newly broken roses shook—
Was it the wind disturbed each rosy head?

God! was it joy or sorrow in her face—
That quiet face? Had it grown old or young?
Was it sweet memory or sad that stung
Her voiceless soul to wander from its place?
What do the dead find in the silence—grace?
Or endless grief for which there is no tongue?
—Charles Edwin Markham in Scribner's.

WAITING TO SERVE.

Rodney Shipton was a southern boy, and, like many a northern lad, he was ambitious. Like many a northern lad, too, his parents were poor and unable to do for their son as they could have wished. But they sent him to school until he was 14 years old, and then, at Rod's earnest request, they sent him to a school of telegraphy for a year, where Rodney learned to send and receive messages over the wonderful and mysterious wires.

For Rod was by no means content with the humdrum life on the twenty acre lot in Mississippi which his father called the farm. It was well enough, he always said to himself and his chums, for "old folks" who were satisfied to raise corn and tobacco, and know nothing of the great world around them, save what they read in the weekly paper. But that wouldn't suit Rod Shipton—"not much it wouldn't."

No, Rodney was anxious to start, bright and early, into the thick of the fight—into the front ranks of those who are taking part in life's great battles.

But Rodney Shipton soon discovered that even those who are willing to do brave and arduous work are not the ones always selected for the most important duties. He had to learn, as so many of us will have to, that, as a great poet once wrote:

They also serve who only stand and wait.

He found very speedily that the great telegraph companies and newspapers were not in need of inexperienced lads of fifteen to place in charge of their offices in large cities and other centers of life and activity.

First, he applied for a position in Washington, and did not so much as get an answer to his application. Then he tried New York, and the manager of the concern wrote back and kindly told the lad that he had better try "nearer home."

At last, much discouraged, Rod did try nearer home. It went much against the grain for him to think that a telegraph operator should be compelled to remain in such a rusty old state as Mississippi. But he braced up, and one fine spring morning he started out on a tramp of more than thirty miles to Jackson. Most of the way he trudged along the railroad track, though he did not mind that. Rod Shipton was used to long tramps; his father had not so many dollars that he could afford to give up two of them for railroad fare.

The lad's shoes were pretty dusty when, early on the second morning, he presented himself to the superintendent of telegraph of the Jackson and Richmond railway and asked for a "job."

"Well, my son," said the superintendent, "you're not very old and you've had no experience, but if you are in dead earnest and want to show us what kind of stuff you're made of, I'll offer you a job. We've got an office up at Snowflake City, seventy miles from here, and we find it pretty hard to keep any one there. It's a lonely sort of a spot; on one side of the track is a swamp and on the other side a scrubby forest, with a sawmill and a store. You'll have very few neighbors, and those that are there are about as rough as they make 'em. There's very little work, and, consequently, very little pay. Now, then, if you'll go down and try your hand as operator at Snowflake City, I'll engage you at a salary of twenty dollars a month. What do you say?"

Well, it wasn't a very bright picture which the superintendent presented to our young friend, and so Rodney Shipton thought. He stammered somewhat as he replied:

"You see, sir, I thought some of a job in the city; and then, sir, the pay—it's awful small; father pays that for a hired man when he wants one on the farm, but—but—yes, sir, I guess I'll take the job in Snowflake City."

"Look here, my lad," said the superintendent, laying his hand with much kindly feeling upon Rod's shoulder. "I know just how you feel about it. I was a boy myself once, just about your size, and with just as much of a desire to do something big as you have. But I started in clear at the bottom; yes, lower than you will have to do, and I stuck to it, and think I did my duty. You do the same, and we expect no more of the best paid man on the road."

And the very next day Rodney Shipton, instead of tramping back to his father's farm, took the train to Snowflake City.

The friendly words of the official who was now his chief had encouraged him greatly, and he resolved to "stick it out" at Snowflake, no matter what might happen, until his ability should be recognized by his employers.

If the picture of Snowflake City, which Superintendent Stebbins had outlined, was a dark one, the reality was still more black and unattractive to Rodney. The neighborhood itself was most uninteresting; Nature had done as little as posssible, it seemed; and the inhabitants were even more uncouth than their surroundings. The men were of the roughest and most ignorant type, while such women and children as graced—or disgraced—the settlement were nearly akin to the men in their tastes and habits. Not that there were a great many of these people, for within a very wide radius of Snowflake station there were not more than a hundred human beings, who were about evenly divided between blacks and whites.

As for Rod, he made his headquarters at the cabin, which was known as "the Station." At first he tried boarding at "the store," which was also a hotel and saloon, but he finally came to the conclusion that he had better "keep house" in the little cabin, which now became for him kitchen, parlor, bedroom and office all rolled into one.

It was truly a lonesome spot, and through the long early summer days and the weird nights, when the breezes soughed and sobbed over the dismal swamp, Rod often got homesick for the old farm. He did not have much work; hardly enough to keep him from growing weary; but, remembering the superintendent's words, Rod did his work promptly and well, and not a single reprimand came to him over the wire from the train dispatcher.

Rod saw few people, for passenger trains stopped very seldom at Snowflake, and the boy did not encourage visits from the rough and—generally—half drunken men from the sawmill.

Three months passed away that were long and dreary ones to Rodney Shipton, and one August day the lad awoke to find himself important.

Yellow fever had broken out at Snowflake City! The state medical officer had been down from Jackson and pronounced four cases of serious sickness as yellow fever of the most pronounced kind. Forthwith a doctor and nurse were dispatched from the capitol to Snowflake, and the district was laid under quarantine. No one dared leave the fever district now until the pest should be driven away, and, for all the communication the wretched people could have with the outside world, they might as well have been living on a desert island in the midst of the Pacific ocean. Stay, there was the telegraph! Touched by the deft and willing fingers of the young operator, the throbbing wires carried all over the country the tale of misery which Snowflake City now told.

In the columns of the great daily papers of the north were printed Rodney Shipton's dispatches, wherein folks learned how the poor, wretched, ignorant people of the forest and swamp were dead and dying; how the four cases speedily increased to fourteen and then to forty. Rodney's messages, calling for aid, brought nurses from the hospitals of the great cities; Rodney's messages brought nourishing food and healthy clothing to those who were fortunate enough to recover; Rodney's messages brought medicines for the sick and even caskets for the dead. And many coffins were needed in the stricken district—for fully half the people died; and through it all Rod stuck to his post. The other folks of the settlement moved away as far as they could within the quarantine boundary, but Rod stayed right on at the little telegraph cabin on the edge of the swamp, and close to the huts and hovels of the sawmill people.

He knew that the people and the doctor could not do without the telegraph; he knew that no one would come from outside if he should desert his post, and he knew quite well that there was not a soul in Snowflake City, beside himself, who could operate the telegraph. So, with a brave heart, he did his duty. Rod did not complain now that his work was light; dear, no! He could hardly give information enough with his little clicking hammer. The eyes of the whole country were upon Snowflake City. The people were sorry enough for the unfortunates shut up by themselves, but they wanted to keep the dread plague at Snowflake.

No trains stopped now. Most of them went flying past, and even on the hottest days the passengers would shut down all the windows, as if they feared to breathe the air in passing. Even the local freight only slowed as she went on her way, and the train men carelessly dumped the barrels and boxes of clothing and provisions on to the little platform for Rod to gather up as best he might.

So the days and weeks dragged slowly along, and one morning the papers had these words at the foot of their usual dispatch from Snowflake City:

"The only telegraph operator in the place has the fever and is fast failing."

Then for days there was no news at all over the wires from the unfortunate village, and the stricken people had to shout the news and their needs to the train men as they passed through the station.

But Rod did not die; he was one of the very few who recovered from the fever, and shortly after he was stricken down the first frost came to gladden and cheer the people of the south, who feared for the spread of the terrible infection.

Yes, Rod recovered, and went, after a while, back to the old farm, to rest and gain strength. And while there he received letters and presents innumerable, congratulating him upon his plucky behavior at Snowflake. Among them was the official thanks of the governor of the state. But the letter which Rod prizes most of all is one from Superintendent Stebbins, and this is what it says:

MY DEAR SHIPTON—You did your duty nobly. Accept my thanks and the thanks of our directors. When you are quite well again we shall like to have you take a position as assistant to the chief train dispatcher at Jackson. The salary is $75 a month. Sincerely yours,

HENRY STEBBINS.

Today Rodney Shipton is manager of one of the largest offices of the very largest telegraph company in the world. I stepped in to see him the other day, and on the wall, over his desk, I saw these words in a neat frame:

They also serve who only stand and wait.

—W. H. S. Atkinson in Yankee Blade.

Puzzled Rosalie.

Rosalie's father had a great friend, Professor Bowlder, rather past middle life, and looking rather more than his age. The learned professor has a wife who is also very learned.

One day Rosalie had been hearing a conversation between papa and the Bowlders, to her distressingly full of dates, references to ancient history and epochs in art and literature. She had made a brave but unsuccessful attempt to appear interested in it all.

Evidently the problem of the Bowlders puzzled her, for that night, as she was dreamily pulling off her stockings, she asked:

"Mamma, when were Professor Bowlder and Mrs. Bowlder married?"

"Oh, some time ago," was the reply.

"Well—Monday?"

"No."

"Well—Tuesday?"

"Oh, no, quite a while ago."

"Well," persisted the little questioner, casting about in her mind for some time much longer ago than Monday, and recalling the learned conversation she had heard, "well—B. C.?"—Youth's Companion.

How to Cure a Headache.

Dyspeptic or bilious headache is very common, and it seems to me it is the headache which is most easily traceable to its cause and most readily avoided without medicine. If you wish to know my advice as to curing bilious headache I say: Eat such food as agrees with you; be temperate in all things and be as regular as clockwork about your habits. In the case of young people this headache can always be traced to some error in diet—as rich food in immoderate quantity, eating at unreasonable or unusual hours, etc.—and it readily gives way to an emetic and sleep.

Almost any emetic will do—ipecac or sulphate of zinc. In the case of elderly persons, however, the headaches, although less acute, are apt to be more tedious and more exhausting. Rest in bed, cold applications to the head and some purgative medicine taken so as to operate in the morning, will usually effect a cure.—Dr. MacHenry in Ladies' Home Journal.

The Egg in Medicine.

In medicine the shell of the egg is used as an antacid, being better adapted to the stomach than chalk. The white of the egg is an antidote in cases of poisoning with strong acids or corrosive sublimate. The poison will coagulate the albumen, and if these poisons be in the system, the white of an egg swallowed quickly will combine with the poison and protect the stomach. An astringent poultice is made by causing it to coagulate with alum. This is called alum curd and is used in certain diseases of the eye. The yolk of the egg is sometimes used in cases of jaundice, and is an excellent diet for dyspeptics.—Good Housekeeping.

Vaccination.

In speaking of the doubt sometimes expressed whether vaccination really confers immunity from smallpox, the sanitary inspector remarks: "We believe that the heroic young woman of Cumberland Mills who refused to leave her room mate suffering with presumable scarlet fever, and who held the dying girl in her arms, all unconscious that she had smallpox, has not ceased to be thankful for her successful vaccination of two years before, and to the man who was able to protect the world from its greatest scourge, if she ever heard of him."—Lewiston Journal.

Timely Lighting of a Weed Prevents the Death of American Sailors.

PURSUED BY SPANISH SOLDIERS.

A Jolly Tar Whose Love for Cocoanuts Nearly Caused Blood to be Shed.—A Lively Chase.

A party of gentlemen sat on the forward deck of a Nantasket boat one evening listening to a story told by one of their number.

It happened in the summer of '68 that the bark Ida lay anchored one day at the mouth of the Matanzas river, in the Island of Cuba, and, taking advantage of the calm which existed at the time, the captain ordered a boat manned for the purpose of filling the water casks from the falls of the river, which were four or five miles further inland.

Those who are acquainted with the geography of the island know that along the banks of this river for several miles immense growths of canebrake extend in a convex form out into the stream, affording a safe hiding place for alligators and other reptiles which abound in the vicinity, as well as a retreat for hunters and natives who seek protection from the fierce rays of the sun by rowing along under this naturally constructed canopy. The banks on both sides are also lined with stately cocoanut trees, some of them as high as a hundred feet and bearing aloft the precious kernels which in this instance were almost a fatal temptation to the boat hands.

After filling the casks the crew proceeded leisurely to return to the ship, it being well toward evening by that time, when the gentleman who told the story, being an excellent climber, proposed that they should procure a few cocoanuts as evidence of his prowess in this respect.

The boatswain, like Barkis, was willing, and soon the jolly tar was ascending the tall trunk of a neighboring tree, encouraged by the plaudits of his comrades in the boat, who were already enjoying the refreshing luxury of anticipation.

Their feelings, however, were soon changed to dismay on seeing coming out of a clump of bushes the form of a swarthy and vicious looking Spaniard, who brandished a formidable horse pistol and muttered dire threats in his native tongue to the unsuspecting sailor. The latter, however, heeded not his imprecations, being determined to secure at least one cocoanut for his pains, and continued to mount aloft, while the Spaniard grew still more wrathy in his unintellible jargon, and the boat's crew, seeing that there was likely to be trouble, pulled closely to the shore and the boatman jumping out knocked the Spaniard to the ground just in time to change the course of a shot which had been intended for his comrade.

The situation now grew interesting, for the native, having regained his feet, was struggling fiercely with the boatswain, and the noise of the pistol shot had alarmed a squad of carbinaros or Spanish soldiers who were camped near by and were now hurriedly mounting and hastening to the spot to the number of a dozen or thereabouts.

The two remaining sailors in the boat comprehending the situation quickly gave the alarm, and Jack having by this time secured his cocoanut hastily descended, and picking up the boathook went to the rescue of his comrade by prostrating the Spaniard to the ground, while the carbinaros drew rapidly nearer shouting like a band of Apaches.

Fly was the word, and rushing into the boat all hands pulled for dear life and succeeded in gaining the opposite bank in time to escape the bullets from the carbinaros.

It was now rapidly growing dark, and a brief council of war was held by the boatmen, who were fully alive to their perilous situation, and had yet three or four miles to row in order to reach their vessel. Accordingly it was determined to muffle the oars and pull vigorously for the ship, trusting to the darkness to escape the observation of their pursuers. They strained every sinew and were nearing a bend in the river, confident that they had outwitted the enemy, when the boatswain called attention to a very dim light in the middle of the stream, not more than twenty ship lengths ahead.

It was impossible to define it in the darkness, and they had just concluded it must have been a bonfire when a second and brighter light appeared and disappeared almost as quickly, revealing the fact that somebody was lighting a cigar, and as no strange boats would navigate the river after dark it flashed on them that the soldiers had gained a point by riding to the bend beyond and were now rapidly approaching from the opposite direction.

To decide was but the work of a minute, and, with hearts palpitating, they paddled silently to the bank, gained a passage through the canebrake, and there lay, scarcely daring to breathe while the furious soldiers pulled up the stream, their oars also muffled and swearing dire threats of vengeance on the Americans who had so cleverly evaded them.—Boston Globe.

SIMEON SYKES.

An Alliterative Story Containing a Real Romance.

Simeon Sykes, silver seller, strayed slowly southward, steadily seeking satisfactory sales, soberly sauntered, swing satchel, systematically showing solid silver spoons, sugar shovels, small sized salvers, superior spectacles, scissors, sewing shields. Somber skies sent soft showers, soaking Simeon's satchel, shoes, stockings, shirt, skin.

Simeon soon saw sundry stately sycamores standing sentinel, shading said spinster's spacious shelter; spied Sally, sitting solus, sewing silk stockinett, slyly snuffing sweet scented Scotch snuff. Sudden surprise seized Sally's soul, seeing Simeon's swift strides! Sally's sanctity soon skedaddled shamefully.

She, somewhat sensitive, suspiciously started, suddenly spilled some snuff, soiled stockinett, stammered, stuttered, said, "s-s-seat, s-sir."

Simeon shivered, shook, said, "Smart shower."

Sally said, "Slightly so."

Simeon's shins seemed sore, so Sally sought some soothing salve (Sawyer's), supplied some soft soled slippers.

Square shouldered, slab sided, spindle shanked Simeon seemed satisfied.

Sally said: "Sold some silver since Sunday, Simeon?"

Simeon scolded savagely.

Sally suggested supper.

"Sartin, Sally!" said Simeon: "something sufficiently strengthening. Some strong stimulant."

So Sally sent some sausage, sirloin steak, savory stew, some soothing sangaree.

Simeon's stomach seemed satisfied; so Simeon smoked several "Spanish segars," sat stupefied, soon slept, snored sonorously.

Sally, sitting, solemnly stitching stockinett, suddenly sneezed! Simeon started—seemed scared—suspiciously surveyed surrounding space, shutters, shades; seemed secure.

Sally stopped sewing, said she saw some one slyly sneaking, stealing Simeon's silver.

Simeon, slightly susceptible, seemed suddenly smitten, sought Sally's side, sacrilegiously surrounded sanctimonious Sally Slater's smooth symmetry. She, somewhat suspicious, said, "Soft—sickish!" Simeon started significantly, said, "Sweetest, surely such solitary souls should sympathize."

Sally stopped Simeon.

Simeon seemed snubbed.

She seemed sorry, showed some softening symptoms, supinely sought Simeon's sturdy shoulder, sh! sh! sh! Sim smacked Sally! So straightway surrendering she smacked Sim!

Simeon said: "Set some suitable season."

Sally said: "September." Simeon, shrugging Sim's shoulders, said: "Sooner! surely Scripture sanctions such strong sympathy, say Sunday."

So Sally succumbed.

Seven supernal seasons softly, silently slipped somewhere. Seven small scions sprung, successively shedding sunshine, singing, shouting, seldom sick, squalling sometimes, still sweetening Sally's solitude. So, succeeding summers serenely spent, Simeon's seven stalwart sons seized soldier's swords—successively subdued southern secessionists—subsequently settled south.

Simeon still sells silver, supplying substantial subsistence.—Detroit Free Press.

He Had Reasons.

"I've had my hosses and wagon stole!" shouted an excited farmer as he rushed into police headquarters yesterday.

"Where from?"

"Right out here on the square!"

An officer was detailed to go with him and investigate, and as they reached the market the farmer said:

"I left 'em right over there about fifteen minutes ago."

"There's a team around the corner there," replied the officer. "Did you have a woman with you?"

"Yes—my wife. Say, by gol! that's my rig as sure's you live!"

"What's the matter, Sam?" asked the wife, as they approached.

"Thought the rig was stole."

"I just drove around to be in the shade."

"You go off the handle pretty easily, I should say," observed the officer to the man. "Why didn't you look around a little?"

"Say!" said the man as he moved a few steps away, "I was a little hasty, but I have reasons for it. That woman sitting right there, humble and demure as she looks, has run away from me three times, and I'm expecting the fourth calamity every minit in the day. Go kinder light on me. She may skip me yit before I git out o' town.—Detroit Free Free Press.

Ground Floor Prices.

"How much are strawberries?" she wearily asked a Woodward avenue grocer.

"Ten cents, ma'am."

"Isn't that high?"

"Well, yes, but they are certain to go higher."

"Do you think so?"

"Why, certainly. If Austria and Russia go to war, as now seems probable, strawberries will jump to fifty cents a quart in no time."

"Yes, I 'spose so, and I 'spose Charles will agree that I ought to buy now. You may give me a pint."—Detroit Free Press.

A Frank Explanation.

"Mr. Dashaway," said one of the real lady boarders, as she polished her plate with her napkin, "I hope you will pardon me for mentioning it, but we ladies have been remarking of late that you never appear at the table twice wearing the same necktie."

"The fact is, madam," said Dashaway, as he glanced grimly at Mrs. Slimdiet, the landlady, "I must have some variety."—Clothier and Furnisher.

BISHOP AND CZAR.

A Stalwart Prelate Who Refused to Obey His Majesty's Orders.

TURNING THE TABLES ON THE RULER

Terrific Reception Given the Czar by the Russian Bishop Ambroise.—Bulldozing a Potentate.

Bishop Ambroise was an extraordinary man, renowned for the firmness of his character, the depth of his erudition and the narrowness of his views. The son of a simple deacon, he owed his elevation to his oratorical talent, his historical works, and especially his ascetic virtues. He lived in his episcopal palace with the austere habits that had endeared him to the people. He dressed like a simple peasant, lived in a cell in his palace, and his principal diet consisted of cabbage and radishes. In fact he fared like the poorest moujik; but for all that he had the strength of a giant. His salary of 8,000 or 10,000 roubles he distributed among the poor, giving right and left, and never refusing charity to the hosts of beggars that always swarmed around him.

In 1821, Alexander I announced that he intended to visit Pensa; but if he knew the reception that was in store for him he would have tried some other town. The governor sent the chief of police to the bishop to request him to clean his palace before the arrival of the czar.

"All right," the bishop said, "I can get the mud in front of the place cleared away, but where can I hide your head and the governor's head? It would be useless to bury them in the ground; the odor of your actions would still permeate the whole place."

Of course the two officials were furious, but there was no help for them: Ambroise was too powerful. When the czar arrived the governor gave orders to the archbishop to come with all his clergy and receive the emperor at the front entrance to the cathedral; but that was just what he would not do. He massed his clergy with all their banners at a side door on the southern side. To the remonstrances of the governor he replied, "I am the archbishop, and I alone give orders here."

YANKING THE CZAR UPSTAIRS.

The civil authorities were grouped at the front entrance. The czar, naturally enough, went to the place where the banners were. There were some rather steep steps in front of the side door and the czar complained that his legs were weak and that he would prefer to enter the church through some other door.

"Nonsense!" the bishop exclaimed. "The weakness of your legs doesn't prevent you from dancing. Come!"

Seizing him by the arm the powerful bishop yanked his majesty up the steps. At the threshold the czar bent down to kiss the image that the priest presented to him, but to the utter astonishment of the crowd, the bishop, still holding him by the arm, forced him to bow down almost to the ground. The czar thought that was enough, so he again attempted to kiss the image. "No! three times!" said the bishop. The czar had to obey and bow twice more before he was permitted to kiss the holy image.

That, however, was only the beginning of his troubles. After having heard the Te Deum in the cathedral, the czar retired to the apartments that had been carefully prepared for him by the governor, and was about to enjoy his first nap when all the bells of the churches burst out with a terrific clangor. The archbishop, accompanied by his chapter and an immense crowd, all chanting loud enough to take the roof off, presented himself before the governor's residence and announced his intention to purify the rooms occupied by the czar by sprinkling them with holy water. Alexander I sent his adjutant to the terrible prelate to tell him that his majesty was fatigued and was unable to receive him.

"You are the adjutant of the czar of this earth," the bishop said, "but I am the adjutant of the czar of heaven."

SPRINKLING THE CZAR.

The young man refused to admit him, and the mighty bishop grabbed him by the collar, tossed him back thirty feet in the rear and walked majestically into the czar's room.

"I will have you arrested," the governor shouted, in a furious rage.

"There is not power enough in the whole world," the bishop responded, "to arrest the cross of God."

Alexander had to submit. His rooms were thoroughly sprinkled, after which he was compelled to listen to an interminable sermon on the evils of self love and the passion for luxury. On leaving the emperor the archbishop proceeded once more to the cathedral for the evening office. At 10 o'clock the bells rang out a second time. Then the czar sent word to the archbishop to stop the ringing of the bells for the third time, which was the old Russian custom; but Ambroise would not yield an inch. He was the adjutant of the czar of heaven, and he would take no orders from a lesser potentate. So an hour later the bells began a dreadful racket for the third time.

The next morning his majesty had to review his troops, and, as he wished to hear mass first, he dispatched his adjutant to the bishop with an order to celebrate mass at 6 o'clock and make the services as brief as possible.

"Tell the czar," Ambroise said to the adjutant, "that service will be at 7 o'clock, as usual, and that it will be neither longer nor shorter than usual, but strictly according to the laws of the church."

He kept his word. The czar and his troops had to wait. Of course his majesty had his revenge. Ambroise was dismissed from his office and retired to a monastery, but that did not trouble him, for he had lived while archbishop like the poorest monk in all Russia.—New York Sun.

QUEER KINDS OF COINS.

Interesting by Reason of Their Age and for Various Other Causes.

"Here is the oldest coin ever made in the world," said a collector. "It was made about the year 700 B. C. in Ægina, and you will observe that the design in high relief represents a tortoise crawling across the face of the piece. You will not find any date upon it, because no coin was dated prior to 400 years ago. The most beautiful coin ever made, in my opinion, is this silver piece of Macedonia, which was current in Macedon, now Constantinople, 500 years before Christ, or 200 years earlier than the time of Alexander the Great. Though its face value is only fifty-three cents the coin is worth a price today that would astonish you.

"Here is a specimen of the coin of the smallest value ever issued. It is the 'mite,' so called, such as the widow of the Bible story dropped into the slot for the poor, though it was her last one. One-fiftieth of a cent it was worth, and you observe that its shape is hexagonal. Close by you will notice a piece of money worth $220. It is simply a rectangular piece of gold, stamped with the characters of China, from which country it comes. Lumps of gold are used in China for currency of large denominations.

"This coin with the head of the beautiful woman upon it, so exquisitely designed, was minted in Egypt during the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus, 2,249 years before Christ. The lovely head is a likeness of Ptolemy's wife and queen, Arsonoe, who was grandmother by six removes to the famous Cleopatra. I put it that way because there were in reality several Cleopatras, though most people imagine that there was but one.

"Here is a gold piece that was issued by Darius the Great before the children of Israel returned from the captivity. This is something comparatively modern—the 'marriage piece' of Ferdinand and Isabella, issued to celebrate their union some time before Columbus discovered America. Here is the smallest coin ever issued—the thirty-second of a ducat, minted in the year A. D. 1560, in the free city of Nuremberg. It was worth seven and a quarter cents. By the way, the Swiss it was who first put dates on their coins.

"Perhaps the funniest coins in the world are those roundish, irregular lumps of silver from Siam, running down from the bigness of a walnut to the size of a buckshot, according to value represented. You will notice from the display of United States coins in this other case that during the first year when we coined money in this country, in 1792, we had nothing but copper. In 1794 we obtained some silver from Mexico, and two kinds of silver coins appeared. Not till 1795 did we have gold coins, consequent upon the discovery of the precious metal in different parts of the United States."—Washington Star.

Novel Use of the Telephone.

One of the most novel uses to which the telephone has been turned is reported at Woodstock, Ont., during the progress of the trial of Birchall for murder. The court room is very small, and could hardly accommodate the court attendants, attorneys, reporters and witnesses, much less the eager crowds which the sensational character of the trial drew to the town. A smart public house keeper, however, saw the chance of doing a good stroke of business, and he very effectively carried out his ideas.

On the wall over the judge's head he managed to have fixed a large telephone receiver, which he connected with twenty instruments at his place of business. Here the tubes were rented for a certain time at twenty-five cents a head, and four of the tubes were placed in a private room for ladies. It is needless to say that all day long each day of the trial the hotel telephone was in requisition, and every word that was said in the court was thus carried to the ears of the distant listeners.—New York Commercial Advertiser.

A Boston Man's Gratitude.

A gentleman of this village, while in the New England news rooms in Boston the other day, saw a man drop a roll of money and pass on. Waiting a moment the finder stepped up to the loser and said, "Would you like to see me?" "No, I don't know as I would. I never saw you before." "Well, how about this?" producing the roll. "Gracious goodness!" exclaimed the other, "if I had lost that it would have ruined me. But I suppose you'd consider it an insult if I were to offer you a reward. However, thanks, many thanks." Thus does honesty carry its own blessing, and in an approving conscience Edward has the greater reward.—North Abington Public.

Metal Ceilings.

One of the most excellent of recent innovations is the introduction of metal ceilings in place of wood and plaster. These ceilings do not shrink or burn like wood; they will not stain, crack or fall off like plaster, but being permanent, durable, fireproof and ornamental, will eventually supersede both wood and plaster, besides being in the end far more economical than either.—New York Commercial Advertiser.

There is no longer any question that the educated natives of India are acquiring a taste for British athletics. Not long ago a team of young Bengali footballers gave a fair and square beating to the crack players of an English regiment, while almost any college of any pretensions can place a smart eleven in the cricket field.

A STRANGE SECT.

A Small Congregation Which Worships the Memory of Merra Metta.

SHE POSSESSED DIVINE POWERS.

Curing the Lame, Sick and Blind With Her Marvelous Touch.—Talk With a Devoted Disciple.

The followers of J. Elinor Merra Metta, who in her life was and since her death is worshiped as a divine personage, still keep up their religious observances in this city. At the house of worship, 1,128 South Eleventh street, the congregation holds regular Sunday services. The congregation, through death of old members, has dwindled down to eighteen, and at yesterday's service but seven persons were present.

The services were similar to those one would witness in any German church. The members opened services by singing from the German Evangelical Hymnal. Philip Becker, one of the members, then lifted up the voice of prayer. He prayed earnestly that truth might be sent to the members of the congregation, thanking the Lord for the plentitude of goodness he had bestowed on them.

The only peculiar part of the worship is the reading from a book the writings of Merra Metta. The selections read took the place of a sermon, comment being made upon them by the members. The exercises were marked throughout by a spirit of deep sincerity. The lessons, as read, touched upon the unity of God, of his revelations and of a recital of Biblical stories—the fall of Lucifer and of man principally.

A DEVOTED DISCIPLE.

Nothing could be more simple and unaffected than the service of the congregation. The spirit of simplicity the worshipers carry out in their lives.

Mrs. Eliza Munzert, a widow, and the most devout of Merra Metta followers, gave an extended account of her whom they worshiped. In the story, tradition and Biblical account were most strikingly intertwined, Merra Metta being, according to their belief, the third person in the holy trinity. Mrs. Munzert at first talked in a low, earnest tone, carefully guarding every statement that might appear incredulous. As she progressed, however, she became animated, particularly so when she told of most wonderful acts performed by Merra Metta.

"Yes," she began, "I have devoted my whole life to the service of Merra Metta. Of course I have been abused. The disciples of our Lord were stoned and beaten. But I think of this, that the eternal life to come is of more moment than this transient earthly existence. In Merra Metta's service I shall always labor. When my mother died she clasped my arm, told me that I should never leave her service, and bade me promise at her dying moment that I would always work in the cause. I promised. When my husband died, he said: 'I see it all. Merra Metta is divine. Stay by her.' I confirmed my previous promise, being requested to do so with his dying breath.

STORY OF MERRA METTA.

"Merra Metta was born in a Swiss farmhouse. She was not well learned in book knowledge, so you see what she professed was true and not the invention of a brilliant mind. She was well versed in spiritual things, however. She came to this country and obtained employment as a dressmaker. That was a good many years ago. Yes, I should say it was more than forty years ago. You know dressmakers received poor pay then, and Anna Meister, as she was then known, was worked almost to death to gain a livelihood. Still she always found time for prayer and for the study of the Bible.

"One day a friend of my mother, who was also a dressmaker, called to see Anna at her lodgings. She lived with a family named Burke near Ninth and Callowhill or Race streets. I really forget which of the two streets it was. She went to Anna's room and finding the door open was about to enter. She heard Anna communicating with some one about religion. She didn't want to obtrude so she peeped in. She saw Anna sitting with her back to the door. Her sewing lay confused before her. Anna's hands were rigidly extended from her, the palms were turned outward. Anna still kept on mumbling, but now and then the listener could catch some words from which she learned that the talk was on religion. The caller coughed to attract attention, but did not get it, and Merra Metta still kept on talking.

"After awhile the visitor entered. Then Anna broke out into tears and repeated a story about her angelic visitors who told her never to work any more, but to preach what was told her. You know in the book of John, in chapters 15 and 16, it says that the Holy Ghost should recount what was revealed from above. The visitor became convinced of Anna Meister's divine calling. She said: 'Yes, I see it all. I believe in you. But come, I will take you to a friend of mine who is versed in such matters.'

HER DIVINE POWER.

"The friend to whom Anna was then taken was my mother.

"When mother saw her she closed her eyes and said: 'I see a train of golden angels of marvelous beauty streaming behind you. But in front stand three of most transcending beauty, beautiful beyond compare. Oh! I have never seen such beautiful angels. And on their fair brows I see written, on the one "Raphael," on the other "Michael," and on the third "Gabriel." Michael bears an opened book, printed in golden letters. On his brow are written characters of gold, J. Elinor Merra Metta, which means, "Sent by God," and on your brows, my dear Anna, I see the same words, "J. Elinor Merra Metta." You shall afterward be called "J. Elinor Merra Metta."'

"Merra Metta's divine attributes were often shown, She cured the lame, the sick and the blind. When a lame person came she would pass her hand over the maimed part and say, 'Walk!' When a particular herb would be required for the sick she would tell me to go down a certain street, up another, and through a third and fourth and more. Then she would describe a particular spot and tell me, 'There you will find an herb! I don't know its name, but it will cure this sick person.' I always found it, and it always cured.

"Her revelations would be made in this way: She would pass her hand over a table. There would be revealed to my mother golden characters, unintelligible to anybody else. Thus she told us always to take care of her. It was ordained that she should never work more, and we supplied her with all her needs."—Philadelphia Press.

FRIDAY, JULY 15 1892

Carnegie and his confederates procured the passage of an act by Congress virtually giving them control of the iron business of the United States. This monopoly has already made him and others enormously rich. Knowing the corrupt means by which some laws are made, this man appears to have contempt for all law. In a quiet locality, near one of the great cities, he has erected what is in effect a great fortress. It is surrounded by a strong barricade, loopholed for musketry; machines for throwing floods of boiling water are provided. Every preparation is made for killing by firearms or boiling to death any number of people. Steamboats are prepared, and the experience gained in the rebellion has them clad or lined with iron so as to be bullet proof. Hundreds of hired cut throats, provided with the most improved weapons for destroying human life, are put on board the steamers and sent to man the fortress. All the circumstances of actual war are completed, and this war is waged, not against a foreign enemy, nor against rebels trying to destroy the government, but against working men, citizens of the United States, the men whose toil created the wealth now used for their destruction, the men whose arms would be needed to defend their country against any enemy, and who would again, as many of them have before, freely peril their lives in its defense. If Carnegie may go into the great cities and levy an army of vile ruffians who will hire by the day to commit murder, there is nothing to hinder other great monopolists to join with him in hiring and organizing such mercenaries that working people would be powerless against them. The gravest feature of this terrible business is the revelation it offers that we have such a class of men in our country who regard the regular forms of government with contempt, and are ready to make war on their own account whenever they are minded to do so. All this is the logical, in fact the inevitable result of that vicious legislation that builds up a class of enormously rich men at the expense of the mass of the people.

The proper object of all government is the promotion of happiness for the governed; not for a few, but for all.

We proudly boast of having the best government that exists or ever existed upon the face of the earth. We accept it as a fundamental principle that our government can only be conducted by parties. We let "bosses" control our politics. The qualities necessary to make a "boss" are very simple. The "boss" must be able to tell any number of filthy stories; to drink unlimited quantities of whiskey to be ready with a lie upon all occasions; be the ready tool of some bigger boss; be able to manipulate party conventions so as to secure for lawmakers and judges dunces or rascals; a court that will decide that running a locomotive over "peons" is a joke; a legislator with the brains of an ox and the guts of a hog, or a shameless rascal like Bruner who can sell such oxen and they not know it. And so Carnegie becomes not only a possibility but a fact. He comes into our country a beggar, fawns upon, and like a dog obeys and serves a "boss", becomes a "boss" in his turn, and we place him in our Pantheon, and he becomes one of our divinities. "These be thy gods oh Israel!" Hurrah for the gospel of guts. Eating and drinking are the only joys worth having. "Not on morality but on cookery let us build our stronghold. There, brandishing our frying pan as censer, let us offer sweet incense to the Devil and live at ease on the fat things provided for his elect."

Wyoming and California are both silver producing states and would be benefited by free coinage of silver. The two Senators from Wyoming and Senator Felton of our own State are all Republicans, yet all three voted against the free coinage bill lately passed by the Senate. Dolph of Oregon, also a Republican, voted against the bill. At Ogden a few days ago the Wyoming Senators were hung in effigy. Pity it was only in effigy.

Wherever the Pinkerton mercenaries are met they should be shot like dogs. The Pinkertons themselves are simply condottierre leaders of hired bravos ready to serve in any cause if they are paid enough. These mercenaries have no legal existence; they are outside the law and killing them is a merit, not a crime. Their organized existence is due entirely to rich villains who want to be unlawful tyrants.

PERSIAN HERETICS.

A PERSECUTED SECT DRIVEN OUT BY THE PRESENT SHAH.

The Rise and Fall of Bab, the Mohammedan Reformer—His Brave Though Unlikely Death—The Greater Beba, Who Is an Exile from His Native Land.

Professor Browne, lecturer in Persian at the University of Cambridge, has written a curious book, entitled "The Episode of the Bab." Probably a few people know who the Bab is, but Mr. Browne's researches are certain to awaken interest in the man who was the arch heretic of Persia in the early part of the reign of the present shah. He died a violent death at the hands of the government when it was learned that the heresy that he preached threatened the peace of the national church. His followers live and are faithful to his memory and teachings.

Their leaders are in exile, and Professor Browne's book tells of his extraordinary exertions to see them and get their story from their own lips. They are scattered far and wide. Some of them are in Cyprus; others are in Palestine, safe from the vengeance of the shah. All of them would expect to lose their heads if they showed themselves in Persia. Only the humble followers of the Bab live unmolested in their own country, holding their meetings secretly for fear of the persecution of the angry Mollahs.

The Bab was a Mohammedan reformer, who went to Mecca and came back with a new commentary on the Koran. He spoke of himself as superior to Mohammed and to all other great religious reformers, but he announced that a greater than he was coming. That greater one is Beha, who lives in an earthly paradise called Behje, near Tyre, where Professor Browne found him. The author says he feels quite unequal to the task of conveying a vivid impression of the faces and forms that surrounded him during his visit to this strange retreat. He almost runs short of adjectives when he describes the wondrous and venerable figure of the holy man. He says he beheld a face which he will never forget, although he cannot describe it. The piercing eyes seemed to read his very soul. "No need to ask in whose presence I stood as I bowed myself before one who is the object of a devotion and love which kings might envy and emperors sigh for in vain."

Beha's preaching is a prophecy of the "most great peace" and of the brotherhood and unity of man. The brotherhood of the entire race is coming, he predicts. Prof. Browne says Beha knows the exact position of European affairs and is sorry for the western nations. He sees kings and rulers lavishing their treasures in the purchase of means of destruction instead of procuring the means of happiness. Meekness, concord, obedience, submission are the essentials of his secret in the perfect way. He is loved and revered by all his followers wherever they may be, and many a message from him is read in the secret meetings in Persia of the humble followers of the Bab.

The Bab was not learned in the law like the great doctors of the church, and for that reason they held him in contempt. It was his habit to dispute with them in the temples, and although he was ignorant his wisdom put their knowledge to shame. They said he proved himself an impostor because he talked bad grammar. He showed them that his grammar was the grammar of the Koran, and asked them if it was not better to be wrong with the prophet than right with the rest of the world. Whenever he became too troublesome they beat him with rods. At last they had him shot. A company of infantry was drawn up, and the Bab and one of his followers were placed before it as targets. The first discharge killed the follower, but only broke the cords that bound the prophet. He might have converted his executioners then if he had had time to make the most of the situation. But before he could speak the second volley was fired and the Bab died of many wounds.

His followers were terribly incensed at the outrage, and tried to assassinate the shah. It is said that he fainted with terror at the sight of the conspirators, and was only saved by the timely arrival of his escort. For a time he made Persia very unsafe for the followers of the Bab. He killed their leaders, and to this day those who escaped from their native land have never dared to return. Among the victims was the one Salvation Lass of the movement, the beautiful Kurratu 'l-'Ayn, who, it is said, was a miracle of learning and of every feminine charm. She was killed by slow torture, and to the very last she declared her supreme faith in the teachings of the Bab. The Mollahs who slew her came near rebelling a few months ago when their lord and master threatened to interfere with the tobacco question in Persia. They made him tremble for his life and throne until the obnoxious measures he proposed were rescinded.

Meanwhile Beha is waiting patiently in exile, confident that the day will come when his teachings will triumph in Persia and the leaders of his faith can return to their land.—New York Sun.

How New York Appears to a Foreigner.

Of the ugliness, confusedness and shabbiness of New York nothing new can be said; but fall justice is done to the Central park, which in another generation will be the most beautiful public resort in the world. It would, however, be altogether unfair to judge of America by New York; no other town in the Union can vie with it in dirt, inconvenience and meanness of appearance.—London Spectator.

Writing Letters Without Sight.

A woman whose eyesight has passed almost beyond the failing point finds such relief in using the ridged tablets upon which paper is laid that she says all nearly blind persons should do likewise. "They have made letter writing a pleasure," she says, "where before it was a pain. I put a pin in where I leave off, and I can begin right again after any interruption.—New York Times.

When You Are in Doubt About a Diamond.

Put your finger behind the stone and look at it through the diamond as through a magnifying glass. If the stone is genuine you will be unable to distinguish the grain of the skin, but with a false stone this will be plainly visible. Furthermore, looking through a real diamond the setting is never visible, whereas it is with a false stone.—New York Herald.

KITCHEN TRAINING.

A WORK WHICH HAS HELPED MANY POOR AND RICH FAMILIES.

What "Kitchen Garden Training," Means, How It Was Started and by Whom. Miss Huntington's Great Work for Her Less Fortunate Sisters in a Big City.

"There is so much to find fault with and so much to wish for in such a great big, dirty city as ours that sometimes the good, sweet, modest facts connected with our charitable institutions are overlooked," said a visitor to the Wilson Industrial school and mission as she came away from there the other day. The building at 125 St. Mark's place was turned, nearly forty years ago, from a factory into the pleasant school house which it now is. This school, which was the first institution of the kind in America, is not endowed and is maintained entirely by voluntary contribution. Mrs. Jonathan Sturges is the first director, and many familiar names are on the list of managers.

The matron of the school is Miss Emily Huntington, the originator of the system of kitchen garden training, a branch of work now carried on not only at the Wilson school and elsewhere in this city, but in other American cities and in Canada, England, Ireland, Scotland and France. Miss Huntington has made the mission house her home, and here she watches day by day the results of the methods which she has established.

It is with a fascinating interest that one listens to the tale of how by the merest chance Miss Huntington, at eighteen, just out of school and ready to be ushered into fashion's pleasures, chanced to be taken by a friend to visit a "ragged school," and how the only daughter of fond parents put society and the usual amusements of youth aside, and not in the same manner, but with the same motive as her cousin, Father Huntington, set herself about mission school work.

Nobody could work with Miss Huntington's energy and her capacity for organizing without developing new ideas which should bring forth more complete work, so as time passed on and she gained experience, not only among the poor, but with her own class, she made various discoveries. One was that the leisure of some of the young girls of her acquaintance might readily be put to good account, and another that kitchen gardening might with profit be adapted to the rich as well as the poor.

She obtained the co-operation of some of the mothers and the interest of the girls, so that a meeting was called for the purpose of developing a plan of movement. Fifty girls met at the house of one of the elder women. This was in 1867. It was proved that most of them, no matter how well versed they were in Latin and geometry, knew absolutely nothing about domestic science, so arrangements were made for forming a normal class which should be divided into companies, these companies to go to the mission for regular days of teaching.

These young women, as their paths divided, removed to Boston, Chicago and elsewhere and set up kitchen gardens of their own, with the result that the system has spread everywhere. It might even be said with truth that the other thought, that of the Working Girls' clubs, emanated from this mission, for Miss Grace H. Dodge was one of the fifty young women who joined in the work there, and it was no doubt because of the experience she gained at this time her idea was conceived and developed.

The girls became kitchen gardeners themselves, and afterward, when marriage had placed some of them in homes of their own, they wrote to the founder of the system, "You have no idea how kitchen garden helps me with my servants and my housekeeping," and to others it gave the means of livelihood when unforeseen reverses of fortune made them dependent upon their own resources.

It must be confessed that "kitchen garden" is a rather misleading name, for it suggests to many a place where vegetables are grown for kitchen use. When Miss Huntington was asked about the name, she said: "It means a system by which all the intricacies of domestic science are taught—sweeping, dusting, washing, ironing, waiting at table, etc. I thought a little of changing the name at one time because it was confounded with the term vegetable garden, but I found nothing that quite took its place, and I soon discovered that the fact that the name had to be explained gave it additional importance."

The school hours are the same here as elsewhere—from 9 to 3. There are about 200 girls, ranging in age from five to ten, and there are the usual lessons in reading, writing and arithmetic, which come under the head of study. The training in the kitchen garden branches is little else than a systematized form of play, and this takes up a proportionate part of the school day.—New York Tribune.

A Snap Shot at Albuquerque.

We were driven through the streets (if they may be called such) of Albuquerque. Past the wretched mud hovels of the stooped and wrinkled Mexicans, who opened their weak eyes in indolent curiosity which scarcely tempted them to turn their heads for a further view. They seemed to have nothing to do but sun themselves in the doorways and on long board benches by the side of their mud walls. The only ones we saw engaged in any occupation were those who sat combing out their long, black hair, and these were the women kind. If there is a spot on the face of the earth without a hint of home or cheer, it is this mudbuilt town of winds and sands and flat topped roofs of Mexicans, Spaniards, Indians and cowboys.—Salt Lake Tribune.

Study Your Own Case.

I always insist on my patients studying medicine to the extent of their disease at least. Of course all patients cannot do this. But where it can be done the disease yields much more readily to treatment. There is nothing remarkable about this. It is reasonable that if a sick man knows something as to the nature of that portion of his anatomy which by reason of its disorder brings on disease, he can the more intelligently assist the doctor in bringing about a cure. This rule, if observed, will materially assist in a general improvement of health.—Dr. Merriman in Chicago Tribune.

GOLDEN TROUT.

The following correspondence in regard to the famous Golden Trout of Whitney Creek will be of considerable interest. Mr. Mills is an enthusiast on the fish question and the anglers of Owens Valley are under great obligation to him for stocking our streams with varieties of trout.

CARSON CITY, June 22, 1892.

A. C. HARVEY, Esq.,
Lone Pine, Calif.

Dear Sir:—I enclose a copy letter from Prof. Jordan in regard to the trout you so kindly gave me, which I hope will prove interesting to you. Prof. Jordan is the best authority we have, and is recognized by the U. S. Smithsonian Institute as the best in the United States. I am glad to hear that they are something altogether new to these people. You will see that they arrived in good condition.

Yours, etc.
GEO. T. MILLS.

MENLO PARK, June 18th, 1892.

MR. W. H. SHOCKLEY,
Bohemian Club,
San Francisco, Cal.

Dear Sir:—The three specimens of trout from Mt. Whitney were extremely acceptable. They are the famous golden trout of Mt. Whitney and the upper Kern river, which has attracted the attention of anglers for some little time but which has not yet, so far as I know, received any adequate notice in print.

The trout were first brought to my notice by Lieut. Wheeler's geological survey which brought me specimens in 1877. These were not in very good condition. I regarded them as of the same kind as the trout in the head waters of the Colorado, at the same time calling attention to the remarkable distribution of species on both sides of the desert and the mountains. Later I received other small specimens but still in such poor condition that I could do nothing more with them. The three received from you were in perfect condition and I have had a colored painting made of them.

The fish is really a distinct species of trout entirely different from any found elsewhere either in the Rocky Mountains or Sierra Nevadas. The very small size of its scale, the lack of teeth on the hyoid bones, and the peculiar color markings are all distinctive of this trout which will in time receive a name of its own, thanks to your kind thoughtfulness.

It seems evident, so far as one can judge of such matters, that this trout is descended from the trout of western Colorado, which abound in the tributaries of the Clear river, the Green river and the Grand river and the Gunnison district. But in being separated from these trout it has undergone considerable change, and one would think this separation must have occurred before the Sierra Nevadas were elevated. It has already been claimed by geologists that the Kern Valley, although on the California side of the Sierras, is geologically a part of the Great Basin. Its trout at any rate are wholly different from the rainbow trout of California.

Yours very truly,
DAVID S. JORDAN.

Dennis J. Hessian, of Big Pine, announces himself as a candidate for County Clerk subject to the action of the Democratic County Convention. Mr. Hessian was born in California and came to Inyo county, where he has since made his home, in 1867. He is well known to every voter in the valley as an industrious, capable young man. And if selected to fill the office he will devote his whole time and energy to perform the duties in a creditable manner.

The young people of Inyo county always acquit themselves most creditably on all occasions. In the reported Fourth of July at Williams, Colusa county, which was attended by over 5,000 people, the Farmer says: "The Colusa Quartette sang "Freedom, Freedom, Thine Forever," after which Miss Lena Thomsen read the declaration of Independence. Miss Thomsen is possessed of rare elocutionary abilities."

The Democratic County Central Committee met at Independence yesterday. The time for holding the primary elections was fixed for Monday, Sept. 19th. The convention will be held at Independence, Oct. 1st, the vote standing 13 to 12. Notice of the places for holding the primaries with the names of the Inspectors and Judges will appear in the INYO INDEPENDENT in due time.

The Board of Supervisors at the last session decided to construct a fire-proof vault for the county records. This is a much needed improvement and will meet with the hearty endorsement of the taxpayers. The Board also made a general reduction on the bonds required to be furnished by county officers in order that they may be able to give the same in compliance with the provisions of the new law.

Purses aggregating $1075 are offered by the Directors for the coming Fair. There are quite a number of horses in training in the Valley and good racing may be looked for.

In this issue will be found the announcement of J. J. Moore as candidate for County Treasurer. The simple statement of the fact is all the recommendation Jack Moore needs to the people of Inyo.

ALIAS SUMMONS.

IN THE JUSTICE'S COURT OF THIRD Township, County of Inyo, State of California.

JOHN WELCH, Plaintiff, vs. JESUS ENSENAS, Defendant.

The people of the State of California send greeting to Jesus Ensenas, Defendant:

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff in the Justice's Court of Third Township, County of Inyo, State of California, and to answer before the Justice at his office in said Township, the Complaint filed therein, within five days (exclusive of the day of service), after the service on you of this Summons—if served within the Township in which this action is brought, or, if served out of said Township, but in said County, within ten days; or within twenty days if served elsewhere.

The said action is brought to obtain judgment against you for the sum of $38.60 alleged to be due plaintiff upon an account for work, labor and services performed by one J. W. Murphy in the line of general blacksmith work and for materials furnished you in and about said work at your request, between the 26th day of August, 1890, and the 3rd day of May, 1892, and which said account was assigned to plaintiff herein on the 5th day of July, 1892, and before the commencement of this action, as more fully appears by the complaint on file herein, to which you are referred.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, said plaintiff will take judgment against you for the sum of $38.60, together with costs of suit.

Given under my hand this 12th day of July, 1892. IRV. H. MULHOLLAND,
Justice of the Peace of said Township.
F. E. DENSMORE, Attorney for Plaintiff.

MARY WASHINGTON'S TOMB.

A Visit to the Grave of the Mother of the "Father of His Country."

Driven by "de man what knows mo' 'bout F'ed'icksbu'g 'n enny oder coachman 'bout cher (about here), if the evidence of brother hackmen be of value, we seek the burial place of Mary, the mother of Washington.

The legend of the unfinished monument is familiar to us all, as is the history of the various attempts to revive in the hearts of the American people active interest in the work of repairing the wrong done to motherhood and to the memory of our greatest chieftain. Yet we are conscious of a shock when the carriage draws up within a few feet of the grave. A square construction, seemingly composed of unmortared blocks of marble, supports Corinthian pillars set between buttressed corners. There are two columns upon each of three sides; from the fourth, one is missing. A marble obelisk, blackened by mold and stained by the snows and rains of fifty-nine years, lies upon the ground at the base of the "memorial" (heaven save the mark).

The intelligent coachman says his piece:

"Marthy, or Mary Wash'n'ton, or whatever dey call 'er, been buried under dat ar monerment. Some folks say 'twas a mighty han'some monerment 'bout a hund'ed year ago. Oder folks say 'tain' neber been finish' no time. Don' look like 't eber will be finish' now. Ki-yi! When folks been dade a hund'ed years nobody gwine ter take de trouble ter put up a tombstone for 'em."

We are wiser than he on the last head. The recurring consciousness of this salves the mortification and pain induced by the sight of the disgrace, and the recollection of the abortive enterprises for the removal of the blot from the national escutcheon. We do not add to our cicerone's stores of general information our knowledge that the ground on which we stand, and the five acres immediately encompassing the grave, are the deeded property of the National Mary Washington Memorial association; that collections are steadily if not rapidly being made by the organization for the erection of a new and fitting monument; that the faith in ultimate success of the women who have the movement in charge has never wavered since they set their hearts and heads upon righting Mary Washington in the eyes of a republic that is rather unthinking than ungrateful.

Our busy fancies fall to work instead upon the shadowy outlines of the pile that is to do away with the fact and the memory of the crumbling fragment before our bodily eyes. Two of us sit upon the half buried obelisk, a third walks about the ruin, thrusting a tentative cane into interstices and shaking a mournful head. The tentacles of wire grass are digging out the disintegrated mortar, tufts of sheep mint, bruised by the intrusive ferrule, breathe pungently; a rank plant that may develop into "jimsen weed" leans impertinently toward us from the earth deposited upon the top of the memorial by the winds of sixty years, save one. Sir Oracle is looking over the wall into the small burying ground behind the incomplete tomb as motionless as the marble.

The cornerstone of what we see was laid May 7, 1833, in the sight of 15,000 people. As President Andrew Jackson deposited an engraved plate in the hollowed block, he is reported to have predicted "that the American pilgrim will, in after ages, come up to this high and holy place and lay his hand upon this sacred column. May he recall the virtues of her who sleeps beneath, and depart with his affections purified and his piety strengthened, while he invokes blessings upon the mother of Washington.—Marion Harland in Harper's Bazar.

When Labouchere Was in Washington.

When Labouchere was about twenty-three years old he tired of his wanderings, and through his uncle, Lord Taunton, was appointed an attache to the British legation at Washington. Some odd stories are told of him there. The minister, Mr, (afterward Sir John) Crampton's, chief object in life was to escape the wiles of the unmarried ladies in Washington, who one and all were wont to lay siege to him. By way of forwarding the interest of the belles of Washington it was a pure delight to young Labouchere to drive out to visit the minister, accompanied by as many fair ones as the carriage would hold. These girls would sit and chatter by the hour together, until Crampton would almost beseech Labouchere to take them away. At last Sir John denied him admittance.

There was then nothing left for this practical joker to do but to keep up the bombardment with marriageable ladies by giving a letter of introduction to every lady who expressed a wish to become acquainted with the unhappy bachelor. This practical joking had a strange sequel. It was Mr. Labouchere who gave a letter of introduction one day to Miss Victoria Balfe, the prima donna and daughter of the composer of the "Bohemian Girl." The lady went and saw and conquered. She married the minister and became Lady Crampton. The union, however, was not a happy one, and after the dissolution of her marriage with Sir John she wedded the Duke of Frias.—London Cor. New York World.

Managing Hubby.

Wife—I shall need ten dollars today.

Husband—Good gracious! I gave you ten dollars yesterday, ten dollars the day before and ten dollars the day before that.

Wife—I need the ten dollars or I would not ask it. I wish to get a new dress.

Wife—No, but this ten and the other three tens make forty. Goodby, dear.—

THEY HEARD THE TERLAPHONE.

How a Smart Telegraph Operator Exhibited One of Edison's Inventions.

"The trouble that is being experienced in several cities with electric light wires and the number of men who have been killed in repairing them," said a Western Union Telegraph operator, "reminds me of a lot of smart men who, when electric lightning was first talked about, thought they knew more about it than Edison. They wouldn't let me say a word about electricity, and indeed I didn't know much about it, but certainly more than any of those hayseeds, and I had to play a joke on them which, although it didn't kill any of the greenies, came near killing me with laughing.

"It was in a little Iowa town, and I was the manager of the little Western Union telegraph office. Every night the people would get together in small crowds in the various stores and lounging places, and the amount of knowledge they showed in regard to electric lighting would have made Tom Edison go sit down in the woods and wonder whether he knew what he was doing or not. Oh, they were awfully intelligent on that subject, and if I ventured to make any correction of their foolish notions, I was told in plain words that I had better keep quiet in the presence of such learned company. Well, I thought they needed taking down a peg or two, and after a little thought as to how it should be accomplished, I took a newspaper reporter into my confidence, and in the next issue of the paper appeared the following startling bit of news:

"'On next Saturday afternoon at 4 o'clock the citizens of R—— will have an opportunity to witness one of the most wonderful exhibitions of Edison's genius as an electrician that has ever been seen. At that time a telegraph wire will be connected with The Omaha Bee office and Beecher's church, in Brooklyn, and several tunes will be played on the organ of the church, which can be heard at all points through which the wires will pass. The local manager of the Western Union has been notified that one of his wires will be used, so that all who are at the Western Union office at the above mentioned time will hear this marvelous performance of Edison's latest invention, which is called the terlaphone.'

"Well, you would have thought there was a country fair in progress in that town the next Saturday. As early as 9 a. m. the farmers began to come in, and by 3 o'clock the office and the pavement in front of it was crowded with those smart electricians who would hear the music box and then tell each other how easy it was done. Yes, they heard it and told how it was done, but their explanation of it was on a par with their sense on electric lighting."

"But where did the music come from?" asked one of the boys whose shoes were fast filling with muddy Ohio river water.

"Well, I'll tell you. A girl at the house where I boarded had a little music box that played three tunes. Two of them I had never heard before nor since I saw the box, and the third one was 'The Last Rose of Summer.' I took the box and put it in the bottom drawer on one side of my desk, and put a match under the wheel so the thing couldn't go off, and on the end of the match I tied a long piece of thread, which I run up behind the desk to the top drawer on the other side and fastened it, so that if I pulled that drawer out the thread would pull the match out of the wheel and let the organ play.

"Promptly at 4 o'clock I remarked that I would smoke a cigar, and opened the drawer to get a match, and away went the 'organ in Beecher's church.' You could have heard a pin drop while the music box played its three little tunes, and as the box was smothered up with paper and other things that will accumulate in a desk, the deception was very plausible. But when she began 'The Last Rose of Summer' I had to blow my nose constantly to keep from laughing. When it was all over the crowd went away, satisfied that what they had heard was a genuine exhibition of one of the great Edison's wonderful inventions, and, as far as I know, they have never learned any different, as I left there shortly afterwards to find a place where people didn't know so much."—Cincinnati Commercial Gazette.

A Dying Man's Vision.

An impressive incident occurred years ago in Hartford. The man who related it was so profoundly impressed with the reality of a supramortal meeting and recognition that he never forgot it. He is still living in a western state. On this occasion he was a watcher at the bedside of a dying man—a printer. He is a very "practical," hard headed man and one of the last to be given to fancies. For half an hour, he said, the dying man had been sinking. The breathing, growing more labored, became slower and fainter. The watcher thought the man was dead, when suddenly his eyes opened with a glad look of wonder and joyful recognition. He threw up his arms as in an embrace, and his whole face was illuminated as he rapturously exclaimed, "Why, mother!" The same instant he fell back dead. "Nothing will ever convince me," said the watcher, relating the occurrence years afterward, "that that man didn't actually see his mother then and there."—Hartford Times.

Short Boiler Tubes for Locomotives.

Some experiments recently made in France on the comparative merits of short and long boiler tubes have resulted in standard lengths of 13 to 14 3-4 feet being adopted by the Paris, Lyons and Mediterranean railway for its locomotives. Boilers with tubes of this length were found to give a total evaporation in a given time 5 per cent. greater than boilers having tubes 16 1-2 feet long, though the rate of evaporation per pound was slightly greater with the long tubes.—New York Commercial Advertiser.

Doubtful About It.

They were gathered sorrowfully around the couch of the poor fellow who had been smashed to pieces under the hammer of a pile driver.

"Do you think he will recover?" asked a young lady—possibly his sister—perhaps one who held a nearer and dearer relation.

With a mighty effort the wounded man raised his head. "Doctor," he said, "I should like to get well, but when I think what a bore I should be going about forever through life and bragging over my narrow escape, I feel it best that I should go."—Boston Transcript.

Miss Jones (severely) — Mr. Malapropos, with the score 1 to 0 against the home nine in the ninth inning, the bases full, two of our men out and Bangit at the bat with two strikes and three balls against him, I am in doubts as to whether I am married or single.

IN FOOTHILL GROVES.

Where Ira G. Hoitt Has Found Retirement.

THE INTERESTING ENTERPRISE HE IS NURSING.

The Well-Known Educator Gives an Interesting Account of Himself.

Since the expiration of his term of office as State Superintendent of Public Instruction, a little over a year ago, but little has been heard of Ira G. Hoitt who filled that office for four years.

An Evening Post reporter who went in quest of him yesterday found him at one of the most charming places of retirement in California.

Alighting from the train at the pretty suburban village of San Mateo he was soon speeding over the country road which presented a panorama of luxurious beauty. Two miles from the town a narrow lane opened in the road. The long graceful curves of this lowely and shaded lane were followed for nearly a mile westward toward the foothills, and at length the open gate of a magnificent private estate was entered. After rounding the top of a little hill, picturesque country seat nestling in a sheltered place at the foot of graceful hills burst on the view. A well-kept orchard, acres of flowers and a neat garden spot were successively passed, and then came a picturesque bridge over the neck of a little lake and under an arch of massive live oaks. The long porch which ended the journey was embowered in roses and palms; flowers and foliage of various kinds charmed the eye at every turn.

This was the country home of the late J. H. Redington who for years lavished wealth on the house and grounds. It was secured last year by Mr. Hoitt who opened there Hoitt's Oak Grove School for boys. The house is elegantly furnished, has a library, billiard-room and every facility for the enjoyment of home comfort. Not a sound of exterior human life reaches this romantic retreat—sheltered by hills and by live-oak groves. Here the well-known educator was found, enjoying his life and labor as master of a school in which his own educational ideas could be wholly carried out. In response to a servant's summons, he came from the school-building where recitations were going on and cordially greeted the reporter.

"Yes, we are rather in retirement now," he said, "but we are enjoying the life. We have twenty-five boys now and there are four instructors besides my wife and myself. I find that my health has been better here than for years past, although I have never had any serious trouble since my severe attack of sciatica about six years ago. My physician finally gave me relief, but symptoms of rheumatism continued, appearing especially in my right arm. Many people have been surprised that I did not go to my physician again, but I did not. Some friend suggested that I try Warner's Safe Cure," and as it was very easy to do I did it. It gave me immediate relief and since then I have used it at every recurrence of rheumatic symptoms. I have not used anything else and it has never failed to give prompt relief. I have a bottle on hand now, and only day before yesterday I bought a bottle for one of our boys who had pains in his back. If I felt at liberty to do so I could mention the names of acquaintances who have used it with great success. One is a man in business in Oakland who tried Warner's Safe Cure for kidney trouble and was cured. As you ask me the question directly I have no hesitation in saying that I regard it as a very valuable remedy, for my own experience has demonstrated that it is."

The reporter thanked Mr. Hoitt for the information he had so candidly and courteously given, and almost regretfully withdrew from the beautiful groves where the eminent educator has found an ideal place for a seat of learning.—San Francisco Evening Post.

He Wanted That Egg.

In a cheap down town restaurant, where texts from the Scriptures adorn the walls and cheer the hungry as they discuss the modest bean or the domestic pie, an old man was painfully consuming an egg. He was gathering the residuary food which clove to the sides of the glass, when the waiter swooped down on the table and cleared off the debris of the meal.

As the old man vigorously licked his spoon after its last excursion around the glass, he raised his eyes and his jaw fell.

Then he tapped on the glass with his shaky hand, and said pleadingly to the waiter:

"Waiter, won't you bring back that egg? I haven't eat it yet!"

And the waiter brought it back.—Chatter.

Ready for Questions.

Four or five fellows were talking of gas wells on West Seneca street. Along came George Urban, a well known gentleman who recently wanted to establish a gas company. "Well, George, what have you done with your thousand foot well?" asked one of the fellows. "Oh, I have pulled it up and cut it into post holes of three feet apiece, for which there has been a good demand from the suburbs." It was agreed that the inquirer had been well posted.—Buffalo Courier.

His Intentions.

She—Sir, what do you mean?

The Culprit (smacking his lips and unabashed)—I mean to do it again if I get the chance.—Epoch.

Poor Willie.

Teacher—Johnny, take the sentence, "He went home." Is "went" a verb or a noun?

Johnny—A verb.

Teacher—Next!

Willie—A noun.

Teacher—Johnny is right. Willie, you may remain after school and say your lesson over again.—Harper's Bazar.

A Corean Superstition.

In Corea three spirits are supposed to enter the world with every infant, guarding the child until it grows up. For these mysterious protectors three little bands are sewn upon the child's waistband, each containing a lock of its hair.—Washington Star.

The Latest Addition.

Mrs. Bangle—Isn't your piano something new? I suppose you hire it by the month?

Mrs. Wangle—Oh, yes. The piano mover told me he brought it direct from your house.—New York Herald.

How Gypsies Treat a Dog.

The tent gypsies cut the tail off of a dog that comes into their possession so that he may not turn back into a man in case he has been one and had been changed by a witch into a wolf.—Philadelphia Ledger.

Family Loyalty.

A Stevens avenue young lady was much pained and shocked as she walked down the street yesterday to see her young brother sitting astride the prostrate body of another boy, and raining down blows upon his struggling victim.

"Johnny!" she almost screamed, "what are you doing? Come here this minute. Aren't you ashamed of yourself, fighting this way in the street?"

The boy reluctantly arose from his vanquished antagonist and faced his indignant sister. Then he explained:

"Well, I don't care. He said you wasn't good looking. I don't think you are either, but it ain't none o' his funeral. So I licked him."—Minneapolis Journal.

Incredulous.

Dashley—Queer things people discover when they are living in boarding houses. At dinner at my boarding house yesterday I stuck my fork into a piece of pie and brought up a collar button that I lost a week ago.

Snaggs—That's nothing. I lifted off the top of my strawberry shortcake at my boarding house yesterday, and what do you suppose there was in it?

Dashley—I give it up. A silk umbrella, perhaps.

Snaggs—No, sir; strawberries.

Uncle Was Willing.

A young man known as "a gilded youth" sent the following note to a rich uncle the other night: "Not one word—if you do not send me $2,000 before midnight I shall cease to live." A similar demand had been received earlier in the day, so the fond uncle replied: "In response to a former favor I have already forwarded you my revolver. It is in good condition and loaded."

Education Neglected.

"I think that the young men of the present day are very deficient in mental culture," said a young lady; "don't you, Mr. Strokohr?"

"Very," was the reply. "Why, the other day I actually met a young man who didn't know what I meant when I said that Kelly fumbled a foul ball."—Merchant Traveler.

ACROSS THE DEEP, TO THE FAR WEST.

On steamboats, cars and stage-coaches, Hostetter's Stomach Bitters is carried as the most important item in the materia medica of the traveling public. It deprives vitiated, brackish water of its hurtful properties and execrable flavor, counteracts the pernicious effects upon the stomach of bad or indigestible food, remedies cramps, heartburn and wind upon the stomach. It is a fine defense against malarial disorders, nullifies the effects of excessive heat, cold and damp, relieves sick headaches, and is an incomparable cure for costiveness and billousness. The fatigue of travel often tells most disastrously upon invalids and convalescents, occasionally to such an extent as to jeopardise life. Persons in feeble health, apprehensive of bad effects from travel, will, if provided with the Bitters, be far less likely to have their fears realized.

Servility is to devotion what hypocrisy is to virtue.

DEAFNESS CAN'T BE CURED

by local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure Deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube gets inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed Deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

We will give One Hundred Dollars for any case of Deafness (caused by Catarrh) that we can not cure by taking Hall's Catarrh Cure. Send for circulars, free.

THE BEST IN THE WORLD.

Senator Henry C. Nelson, of New York, writes:

"On the 27th of February, 1883, I was taken with a violent pain in the region of the kidneys. I suffered such agony that I could hardly stand up. As soon as possible I applied two ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS, one over each kidney, and laid down. In an hour, to my surprise and delight, the pain had vanished and I was well. I wore the plasters for a day or two as a precaution, and then removed them. I have been using ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS in my family for the last ten years, and have always found them the quickest and best external remedy for colds, strains and rheumatic affections. From my experience I believe they are the best plasters in the world."

It costs more to revenge injuries than to bear them.

The proprietors of Ely's Cream Balm do not claim it to be a cure-all, but a sure remedy for Catarrh and Cold in the head.

I have been afflicted with catarrh for 20 years. It became chronic and extended to my throat, causing hoarseness and great difficulty in speaking, indeed for years I was not able to speak more than thirty minutes, and often this with great difficulty. I also, to a great extent, lost the sense of hearing. By the use of Ely's Cream Balm all dropping of mucous has ceased and my voice and hearing has greatly improved.—Jas. W. All gone—woman's suffering and woman's weakness. Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription puts a stop to it. It's a remedy for all the delicate derangements and disorders that make her suffer, and a cure for all the diseases and disturbances that make her weak. It's a legitimate medicine, that corrects and cures; a tonic that invigorates and builds up; a nervine that soothes and strengthens. For bearing-down pains, displacements, all the functional irregularities peculiar to the sex, it's a safe and certain remedy.

Other medicines claim to cure? That's true. But they don't claim to do this: if the Favorite Prescription fails to give satisfaction, in any case for which it's recommended, the money paid for it is refunded.

I want to tell you about my kitten—
The prettiest kitten that ever purred;
But I've looked my speller through and through,
And I can't discover a single word
That rhymes with kitten,
Excepting mitten,
And that is old and too absurd,
So the only thing for me to do
Is just to send you what I've written,
And wait till she grows to be a cat—
There are ever so many to rhyme with that!
—Helen C. Walden in St. Nicholas.

IDENTIFIED.

He was a handsome, grand looking man, unusually tall and powerfully built, with blue eyes, keen and flashing as well tempered steel, which yet on occasion could melt with sweet, sunshiny beams. A tangle of red bronze hair was brushed back from his forehead, and a long, thick, silky, curling beard, parted in the middle, was blown hither and thither by the breeze as he walked.

A miner from Pike's Peak. Like all miners, he wore the regulation red flannel shirt and broad brimmed hat, tucked his pantaloons into his strong, high boots, and was heavily armed, not only against the wolves, rattlesnakes and "grizzlies" of the desert and mountains, but against the fiercer and more dangerous animals of his own species.

As, by stress of circumstances, every man in a mining country is "on the shoot," it necessarily comes to pass, in this pernicious state of things, that to obtain from his neighbors a high estimation of his moral and physical virtues a man and miner must dictate his opinion out of his revolver. Situations constantly arise for imminent and instant use of this persuader; and however much the pious—if there were any of that sort—might "trust in the Lord," they one and all took just as much care to "keep their powder dry" and their bullets forthcoming.

Among miners from every state, all quick witted and alert, the Texans hold a proud pre-eminence in the astonishing readiness and dash with which they handle their shooting irons. They have closely studied the matter, and have so simplified ways and means that instead of wearing their pistols in the ordinary way, that is, uncocked in leather holsters at the belt, the long headed Texan suspends his revolver at full cock from steel hooks attached to the belt; the other end of the hook passes through a ring in the stock of the weapon. Thus, while a gentleman who differs in opinion with him is unbuttoning the flap of his holster, drawing his pistol and cocking it, our Texan, with nothing in the world to hinder, clutches his revolver, and in a twinkling lets daylight into the other before he understands what on earth is the matter; but who, perhaps, with the supreme intuition given to some at the last moment, learns too late that simplicitas optima est is a factor of vital import "down in the mines."

Our "Piker," who was from Missouri, had caught the Texan trick, and more than once had owed his life to his trusty, ready six shooter; he was now going home to his family with the money which had required months and often desperate efforts to keep, and to save from many a wretch who would commit murder with pleasure to steal ten dollars or ten thousand.

The miner arrived safely at San Francisco, and straightway proceeded to a branch of the famous house of Page, Bacon & Co., where he bought his gold dust and gave in exchange a draft on their main banking house in St. Louis, at which city he arrived in the course of time, late at night.

As a man might have been seen, had he but always kept a sharp lookout, tread through the streets of St. Louis during the strong breeze blowing, his cloak thrown over his shoulders. There was a far away look in his steel blue eyes, a depression pervading his whole manner as if he had left the fatal dangers of the West behind him forever, and was nearing home, long for peace and happiness of his home.

Presently he arrived at and entered the banking house of Page, Bacon & Co. With a quick nod by way of salutation, he strode on into the cashier's room, drew out an old pocketbook, took from it and threw on the table a draft from their branch banking house in California.

"I want the money for that draft," he said simply.

The cashier took up the paper, examined it closely, turned it on its back, and saw that it was indorsed in a rough but muscular hand with the name of "Allan Brayton." Then he spoke a few words to a clerk at a desk near by. Books were opened, a name noted, and "All right, sir," was returned by the examiner.

"Yes," said the cashier, "we have had advices from our house in San Francisco. Your draft is quite correct, sir, and now all that is necessary is for some one to identify you."

A look of dull mystification came into the man's face, and in a slow, vague, questioning voice he repeated, "I-den-ti-fy? I don't know what you mean."

"I mean that some one whom we know, and you know, must declare that this is your name on the back of this draft, and that you are the person who wrote it."

"Sir,"—the grand form dilated and the blue eyes blazed—"sir, what do you take me for—a thief?"

"Oh, no; you don't understand."

"Sir, I tell you I'm a squar man. Five years ago I went to the mines to make sumthin', if I could. I moseyed round till I found a pocket. It did not pan out very rich; but I worked and saved till I got enough to keep the wife and chicks decent, and then I tell you I was glad enough to get out of that murderin' crowd, and I had to dig out very quiet, too, just as if I had perticular bizness 'round the corner. I took my pile to your men in 'Frisco, who gave me that paper, which they said was as good as the money when I showed it to you. Now all I want you to do is to give me my money."

"But just listen," said the cashier earnestly. "We must take the precaution to have you identified, for your sake as well as for ours. See, now, a great many merchants come here to buy goods to sell at the mines; don't you think that if you look around a little you might find some one who had seen you there, and who would step in and say so?"

"Look here, mister," answered the miner, with a hazy, wistful smile, and pathetic shake of the head, "I came into this town last night. I looked 'round for some face I had seen before, for I felt lonesome. I hadn't a friend. Why, I felt so bad I'd a been glad to meet some of those old cocns who used to tell us blood and thunder stories in Alligator gulch, tho' I knew they were lies every one of them. And coming here this morning, I looked at every man I met, but they were all strangers; ain't a man in the hull place that would cotton to me worth a cent. Now, you just look a-here," he continued, coaxingly, "don't you go to bein' a contrary, panned out, old settler, but just let me have my dust. My wife and my two little kids are waiting for me. They don't want no 'dentifying of me; they never hearn of sich a thing. I ain't got to be a withered old man of a daddy in these five years. I'm just the same as I were; so now, just you give me that money, an' let me drift along."

"How am I to make you understand?" said the perplexed cashier. "See here, my friend, we'll suppose a case. Suppose away in those mining regions, where a man's life is hardly worth a snap of the fingers, some drunken, quarrelsome wretch had killed you, and assuming your name with your money he had got the draft from our house in San Francisco and came here to have it cashed. Suppose we believed him and cashed the draft. Afterward it was discovered that you have been murdered, and the wretch who killed you has disappeared with your money. Your poor wife and children to whom it would rightfully belong are in great want, and the reason she has lost it is that we neglected to make sure that it really was her husband and their father who had come with the draft. Don't you see that for your sake and their sakes we must know that you are the man you represent yourself to be?"

At this point the good cashier laid one hand kindly on the miner's arm, and rested the other on his shoulder, the more strongly to impress his words.

"But, in the name of Cæsar," said the discouraged miner, "how am I ever to git home? Look a-here, stranger, I've given you a plain statement of all wool facts about myself. I'm Allan Brayton! I'm no murderer! Why, my young ones'd know me in a minute. They'd come runnin' and singin' up to me so sweet and chipper that the birds would stop and listen; blamed if they wouldn't!" and a choke came in his voice; "and my wife, I tell you"—and the choke deepened into a dry sob—"my wife, if she seed me a hundred yards off, why, she'd fly down to me light as a snow flake on an oak bough. Dash! you mought knock me down with a straw. If I can't git home, I mought as well slam my pistol to my head and yank the trigger. That'll fix it, I reckon. No one else will come and say he is Allan Brayton, and you can just tote that money on to my wife, and say I'm dead."

"Oh, nonsense! Cheer up," cried the cashier, who was feeling a little choky himself. "Nonsense! Some one must come along in a day or two who will know you; or, suppose you send for your wife to come here."

"How can I? Every cent is locked up in that draft, and it won't pay no dividends."

He walked to the outside door of the office, looked with his keen glance up and down the street, then burying his chin in his great curling beard he seemed to be plunged in deep thought.

Suddenly he faced about with a shout that made all the clerks in the office jump and set the ink bottles bobbing around the desk. His eyes gleamed lightning. "It's all right; this'll fetch it," he cried; "don't want anything better to 'identify me!" As he was speaking he was tearing off his coat, tearing off his vest, snatching off his necktie and unbuttoning his shirt—his eyes blazing, his breath coming in great gasps. Then he gave his broad, heaving chest a sounding blow, and in tones full, moving, like the resounding tones of an organ, though each eager, breathless word seemed to have a great sob at the bottom of it, he pointed to his breast and exclaimed: "Look! look! Here, here is the 'dentification! It were warranted fast colors when it were done, and so it were, for I've scoured it with soap and water these twenty years. A sailor chap did it when I were a boy and ran away to sea in a fit of cussedness. It hurt so that I yelled like a circus hyena; but thank God! thank God! it'll 'dentify me now!"

He held the bosom of his shirt wide open, and there, right across his heaving chest, was the name "Allan Brayton" tattooed in India ink, with fishes and flourishes all around it! At sight of the name all the clerks at the desks, who had been eagerly listening to his appeal, forgot dignity and discipline, and, rising as one man, cheered Allan Brayton with a heartiness that made the rafters ring.

Something was the matter with the cashier's spectacles, for he took them off and wiped them carefully before he spoke. Then clearing his throat he said: "You are right, Mr. Brayton; that sailor's work has identified you more certainly than the spoken declaration of any other man. I am glad you have been able to satisfy us so completely. You will shake hands with me, I am sure, as a token that you believe that my caution was necessary, and that in our business, as you must acknowledge, 'Eternal vigilance is the only price of safety.'"

In five minutes more Allan Brayton had his money, in new crisp bank notes, securely fastened into a large pocketbook which the cashier presented to him. A relieved, almost radiant look displaced the dismayed, wild, hunted expression of his face as he quickly and silently resumed his garments. Then, shaking hands all around, he strode out of the office, and went gladly and swiftly on his way.—New York Independent.

Boots of Human Skin.

In 1876 the firm of Hahreaholtz Bros., boot and shoe makers of New York city, made a pair of boots from human skin which they sent to the Centennial exhibition at Philadelphia. If we remember rightly, they were never put on exhibition, which goes to show that there was some humanity in the centennial officials if not in the makers of the ghastly footgear. Afterwards they were sent to Professor S. V. Baird, of the Smithsonian institute, who would not allow them shelf room. The skin from which the boots were made was taken from the breast, stomach and back of a man who had died suddenly and been taken to a medical college. In general looks the boots were of a light brown color and somewhat heavier than if made from calfskin. The dark color was caused by the tanning process. The leather was much more porous than either calf or cow skin.—St. Louis Republic.

When Chewing Was Illegal.

The Stonington correspondent of The Norwich Bulletin has a German silver tobacco box that has pasted in the inside of the bottom the "Code of the earliest laws and orders of the general court of Connecticut in 1638-39 against the use of tobacco." On the inside of the lid is the picture of a constable arresting a man for chewing tobacco. Said constable has on a sort of Continental hat, and, after placing the hand of arrest on the chewer's shoulder, he remarked, "Chaw tobacko, will you?" Just a little way off is to be seen the constable's family, the wife, four small children and a dog. One of the urchins thus remarked: "Ma, dad has catched a man chawing tobacko!" The mother replies: "He will have his deserts, my child." This was probably a couple of centuries ago, and yet man hath "chawed tobacko" ever since.

Novelties in Photography.

Many novelties and ingenious modifications of existing processes in photography have been shown at the yearly exhibition of photography at the Crystal palace, Sydenham, England. Several makers are trying the experiment of substituting aluminum for brass in the construction of tourists' cameras, with the object of decreasing the weight of the apparatus. One firm shows some new time and instantaneous shutters, which, when in action, do not cause the camera to vibrate or swing. One maker has adopted a double eccentric notion for the purpose of bringing the lens to any part of the front board, thus doing away with the skewing of the elbows.—New York Commercial Advertiser.

Not That He Loved Her More.

"I can't bear to part with you," he broke in, anxiously, as they stood in the waiting room.

"Why not, John?" she asked, tearfully. "I never knew you to mind it so before."

"Yes," responded the brute; "but I never gave you $50 before."—Van Dorn's.

THE BOWSERS.

They Have a Game of Cards With Unsatisfactory Results.

PLAYING ACCORDING TO HOYLE.

Mrs. Browser Knows More About the Game Than Her Husband Does and it Causes Trouble.

"What's the reason we never have a game of cards?" suddenly inquired Mr. Bowser the other evening, after finishing his paper.

"Because, you—you"——

"Because I what?"

"You get mad."

"I do, eh! That's another of your off hand statements. You nor no other person on the face of this earth ever saw me get mad over cards."

"Don't you get out of patience?"

"No, ma'am, I don't! On one or two occasions you have seen fit to raise a row because I beat you four games out of five, and I have said that I would never play with you again. However, if you think you can keep your temper, and if you want to learn the game of euchre so as to be able to take a hand in company, I will spend the next half hour in trying to teach you."

"And if I happen to beat, you won't—won't"——

"I won't what? Mrs. Bowser, you are acting very strange for a sensible woman. If you are afraid you will lose your temper, and want to cut my throat, why, don't play."

"Shall we play according to Hoyle?"

"Certainly. Hoyle is the standard. What's the use of playing if we don't play according to the standard? Now, then, it's my deal."

"Beg pardon, but Hoyle says we must cut for deal."

"He does, eh? I will bet you $10,000 to a cent he says the man deals first!"

"Very well—here it is. The players cut for deal, and he who cuts the lowest card is entitled to the deal."

"Oh, well, if you are going to stickle over a little point like that I shall know what to expect. Cut."

I got the deal, and spades turned up trump. Mr. Bowser passed, and so it happened that I took every trick.

"Cackling already, are you?" he exclaimed as he took the deck. "Mrs. Bowser, I'll make you a very sick woman before we play three games!"

He turned up hearts, and as I had four of them I ordered him up.

"You order me up, eh! What kind of playing do you call that? I never heard of such a thing in all my life!"

"I order you because Hoyle says 'a player may order up when he hopes to take three tricks.' I hope to take 'em all."

I got every one, and Mr. Bowser shoved back from the table and looked at me in amazement. I dealt the cards and turned up a diamond. I had the joker and the right and left, while he happened to hold five others. I saw him smile sweetly, but as I took three tricks and made my point, he rose up and whispered:

"I don't wonder that some ministers denounce card playing! I can see where it is wicked!"

"Where?"

"You stacked that hand!"

"Mr. Bowser!"

"Of course you did! You deliberately robbed me of two points in the game!"

"Mr. Bowser, you ought to be ashamed of such talk! No one could have dealt more honestly. I sent you to Chicago and you are hurt about it."

"Sent me to Chicago! Why, I'll play you all night and give you a silk dress for every game you get! I've got my eyes opened now, and if you can cheat me again you are welcome to. Just sit right down."

"But I don't want to be called a cheat and swindler."

"Sit right down and play. You think you know all about euchre, but I'll show you that you never saw a card. It's my deal. Clubs are trumps. What do you do?"

"I pass."

"I should say you would! Play to that—and that!"

He took the first two tricks, but I took the next three and euchred him.

"I expected you to," he said in explanation. "Indeed, I can give you four points on every game and then beat you."

He scored one point on the next hand, and I one on the next. I was then three to one, and having a strong hand I made a march and went out.

"And do you call that playing cards?" he demanded as he sprang up.

"Certainly, Mr Bowser. You saw every card as it was played. I have beaten you two straight games."

"I never will believe it! You nigged me out of them!"

"Well, try one more, and watch and see if I nig."

He shuffled, dealt and turned up hearts. Luck was with me. I had the joker and two bowers, and I passed.

"Oh, you do! Well, I should think you would. It's a wonder you didn't order me up."

When he found himself euchred he turned white and gasped:

"How did you get those cards?"

"You gave them to me, Mr. Bowser."

"Never! You took 'em off the pack!"

I finally half satisfied him that I didn't, and I dealt and turned up spades. He passed with four in his hand, and I turned it down.

"I order you up!" he shouted.

"But you can't; I've turned it down."

"Can't I? You take up that card! Hoyle says you've got to!"

"Find me the place."

"You won't take it up!"

"Of course not. What do you make it?"

"I make it an occasion for saying that I'll never play another game with you as long as I live! I calculated to give you a couple of games to encourage you, but I can't pander to no such depravity as this."

"What have I done?"

"What has Catfish Jim and Bunko Bill done? I wouldn't have your conscience for all the money in Detroit!"

He returned to his reading and I to my sewing, and nothing more was said about it. A night or two afterwards, however, when a number of us had gathered at a neighbor's to play a few games, Mr. Bowser confidentially remarked to my partner at the table:

"Say, Jones, you are in luck. I've learned her how to play almost as good a game as I can. Before the winter is out she'll be able to beat me twice out of five."

CHARACTERISTICS OF ANIMAL LIFE.

Nature's Curious Provisions for Protecting Defenseless Animals.

It is perfectly wonderful to notice the phenomenal provisions made by nature for the preservation of the weaker and more helpless animals. In many cases the color of the creature is adapted in a wonderful way to its mode of living and its place of concealment, contributing very materially to its safety. All who live among the green fields, which, by the way, is the way to live properly, know how difficult it is to distinguish the grasshopper from the leaf or blade of vegetation upon which he is at rest, until he betrays himself by moving. Those birds which sing in the hedgerow have feathers upon their backs which harmonize with the color of the leaves about and among which they flit, while the feathers on their breasts borrow the white hue from the clouds above them.

The partridge can hardly be distinguished from the stubble where it makes its nest, while in the more northern countries the winter dress of the hare and ptarmigan is white, like the snow with which the landscape is usually covered, and upon which these animals are seen. Among marine animals the same natural provisions prevail, and go down, however deep, into the water, animal life the same color will be found. The frogs, living in the stagnant pools and muddy ditches by the roadside, are known to vary their color in order to harmonize with the sand or mud in which they live. The little tree frog, on the other hand, is green, and thus is with difficulty distinguished from the tree to which it adheres. Fish, especially those which inhabit fresh water, are so like in color to the weeds and stones among which they lie that it is often very difficult to detect their presence.

One of the most wonderful instances of nature's care in providing for the protection of the more defenseless creatures is found in the apparatus for defense with which the cuttlefish is provided. The very instant its quick eye catches a glimpse of an approaching enemy, knowing by instinct alone—it is absurd to speak of reason in connection with these low forms of animal life—the impossibility of seeking safety by flight, and having no means of defense whatever, it prepares at once to seek safety in concealment. To this end it sinks downward rapidly, throwing out from a vessel with which it is provided, and nature taught it to use, a stream of fluid with which the blackest paint is light in comparison. This soon colors the water far around, and effectually conceals the animal and at the same time is very repulsive to all forms of animal life feeding upon it; and, as it takes considerable time for this to disperse and the water to clear itself, the enemy is generally baffled. If, however, as is sometimes the case, a reasoning animal—man—is in pursuit, and the cuttlefish is still in danger, it pours out another and larger flood of ink, and remains perfectly quiet until the danger is past, when it moves off in a circle, making a larger and larger turn till outside the black water its ink has made.—Chicago Ledger.

A Railroad Ghost Story.

Between Palmer and Farris, on the Houston and Texas road, there is a singular hill in the prairie black lands. It is covered with oak and pecan as tall as Kentucky trees. The locality, though a hill, is always wet. The ground is muddy, and the air murky. The station sign proclaims the name; the siding is called Ghost Hill. The reason of the name is this: At night, while passing this point, time and again has the whistle called for brakes and the bell rung for imaginary crossings. The train men, after setting the brakes, would be terrified to learn that the engineer had not given the signals. More than one crew has incontinently abandoned the service of the company after such experience, not caring to ride over Ghost Hill with the spirit of a fireman killed there many years ago tugging away at bell and whistle.—Texas Cor. St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Jews Among the Caucasian Peaks.

There are eight peaks loftier than Mont Blanc, and fifteen above 15,000 feet. The four highest are Elbruz, Koshtantau, Shkara and Dychtau. It was in the attempt to ascend the last named mountain that the British explorers evidently lost their lives. Mr. Freshfield and the searching party passed through most interesting regions. They came upon small settlements of mountain Jews, who must have been separated from their race at a very early date, and show signs of Persian influence. They passed also through a dense forest to the valley of the Kodor, where local tradition declares that a wild race exists, without arms, clothes or villages.—London Graphic.

Women Decorators.

"A woman with a bottle of gilt, some gold leaf and paste, or a pot of red paint and a small brush, will do more toward decorating a house or a flat in a day," said a resident of Harlem, "than a squad of decorators will in a week. Women seem to have a special aptitude for this sort of work, and they decorate all sorts of in and out places which a professional artist would not think of touching. The curious point of it is that the apparent absurdities of decoration usually have a very good effect. Most of it is art of the crudest sort, but it is effective."—New York Sun.

The Egyptian Lotus.

The Egyptian lotus is the sacred flower of Egypt, China, Japan and India. Until lately it was supposed to be a tropical plant, but within a few years it has been found to be perfectly hardy. At Bordentown, N. J., it has been seen growing where the ice would form a foot thick over the plants.

The flower is magnificent, from eight to twelve inches across. The petals are white at their base, and in the center and at the tip a brilliant crimson. The large cluster of pistils and stamens are bright yellow.—Pittsburg Dispatch.

LACKS TRUTH.

Cold, Indisputable Facts Destroy an Entertaining Ghost Story.

REMINISCENCES OF LORD LYTTON.

More Vabluable in Relation than in Truthfulness.—A Haunted Room Which Did not Exist.

Romantic Lord Lytton was, but not superstitious. His death, however, has revived the story of the yellow boy's room, the ghost chamber said to exist at Knebworth house, the beautiful ancestral home of the Lyttons for more than 600 years. At Mr. W. P. Frith's door must the charge be laid of having put the interesting tale in circulation, for we find it first in his engaging volume of "Reminiscences." After relating Westwood's experiences with the weird woman of the Maison Blob, the painter supplements the story by another anecdote of more tragical significance.

"At Knebworth," he says, "the seat of Lord Lytton, there is a bedchamber called the yellow boy's room." He then proceeds to relate that during a visit to Knebworth, Lord Castlereagh, while the guest of the grandfather of the late British embassador to Paris, was assigned without a word of warning to the mysterious and haunted room. Feeling very tired he soon dropped into sleep, but his uneasy slumbers were troubled and it was not long before he awoke. What it was which startled him his lordship never knew, but the sight which met his eyes as he gazed at the still burning fire in his room was startling enough. The figure of a boy, with long, yellowish hair streaming down, sat in front of the fireplace with his back toward the Irish nobleman. As the latter looked, the lad arose, turned toward him, and drawing back the curtain at the bottom of the bed with one hand, with the other he drew his fingers two or three times across his throat. Of course the impression produced on Castlereagh was decidedly disturbing. Bulwer insisted that he must have been dreaming, but his lordship declared with emphasis that he saw the figure as distinctly as he saw his host at that moment, and that, far from being asleep, he was wide awake.

Mr. Frith then adds that Mr. Bulwer did not tell Lord Castlereagh—Byron's "carotid cutting Castlereagh"—that the yellow boy always appeared to any one who was destined to die a violent death and always indicated the manner of it to his victim.

A more amusing and less unpleasant incident is told of the same chamber at Knebworth by our artist author, the subject being a timid, nervous brother painter who spent a night at the poet's lovely and stately retreat in Hertfordshire. The father of the author of "Lucile," Mr. Frith says, confided the details of the Castlereagh story to his guest on allotting the yellow boy's room to him, remarking on bidding him good night, "You will not be frightened, will you?" "No—o—o," said the painter, with an ashy face. "Well, it is getting late; what do you say to retiring? Yes, that is your candle. Too warm for a fire in your room. You don't mind? Good night." "The rest of the story shall be told," says Frith, "in my old friend's words as nearly as I can remember them. I had seen," he went on, "the infernal room before dinner, and I thought it looked a ghostly sort of place, and when I reached it that night what would I not have given to be back in my own room at home! I looked under the bed, up the great, wide chimney, and had a shock from the sight of my own face in the looking glass. No ghost could be whiter than I was. I don't believe in ghosts, you know, but still it was really too bad of Lytton to tell me such things just as I was going to bed, and then to put me in the very place! There was an awful old cabinet. I managed to pull open the door and was tugging at the other, when my candle went out—how, I don't know—somebody seemed to blow it out. I can't tell you what became of it; all I know is I jumped into bed with my boots on, and lay trembling there for hours. Frith—literally for hours—till sleep took me at last; and never was I more thankful than when I awoke and saw the sun shining into the yellow boy's room."

The circumstantiality with which Mr Frith tells these short tales must convince his readers that he is thoroughly satisfied in his own mind that the incidents which he carefully describes all nappened at Knebworth. And yet, in that respect, he is altogether out in his reckoning. There is no yellow boy's room in that grand old house of the Lyttons at Knebworth. Lord Castlereagh never spent a night there, nor is it known that he ever visited the place in his life. In the autumn of 1884 I spent two or three very agreeable days at Knebworth, the guest of Lord Lytton, who very kindly showed me everything of interest about his home and its charming surroundings.

I thought it strange that the yellow boy's room—if there really was such a room—had not been open to me, and that the very story associated with it in the Frith reminiscences had been kept back. So I sent off a hurried note to Owen Meredith, then performing his embassadorial functions in the gayest capital in Europe, and an early mail brought me these lines:

"PARIS, 8th Feb'y, 1888.

"MY DEAR MR. STEWART—I answer your letter of the 12th ulto. in desperate and unavoidable haste. Mr. Frith's autobiography is all wrong about the story of the 'Yellow Boy.' That story was told by Sir Walter Scott of Lord Castlereagh, who is said to have seen the 'Yellow Boy' in some house in Ireland at the time when he was secretary for Ireland, just before the union, and the story went that the apparition then predicted to him the mode of his death. But the incident certainly did not occur at Knebworth, nor do I think Lord Castlereagh was ever there. Yours very faithfully, LYTTON."

The Castlereagh story is quite familiar to the readers of Scott and Lockhart's noble biography.—Independent.

THE VIRTUES OF APPLES

Their Medicinal Value and Some of the Troubles Which They Aid.

Chemically the apple is composed of vegetable fiber, albumen, sugar, gum, chlorophyll, malic acid, gallic acid, lime and much water. Furthermore, the German analysts say that the apple contains a larger percentage of phosphorus than any other fruit or vegetable. This phosphorus is admirably adapted for renewing the essential nervous matter, lethicin, of the brain and spinal cord. It is, perhaps, for the same reason, rudely understood, that old Scandinavian traditions represent the apple as the food of the gods, who, when they felt themselves to be growing feeble and infirm, resorted to this food for renewing their powers of mind and body. Also, the acids of the apple are of signal use for men of sedentary habits, whose livers are sluggish in action; these acids serving to eliminate from the body noxious matters which, if retained, would make the brain heavy and dull, or bring about jaundice or skin eruptions and other allied troubles.

Some such an experience must have led to our custom of taking apple sauce with roast pork, rich goose and like dishes. The malic acid of ripe apples, either raw or cooked, will neutralize any excess of chalky matter engendered by eating too much meat. It is also the fact that such fresh fruits as the apple, the pear and the plum, when taken ripe and without sugar, diminish acidity in the stomach rather than provoke it. Their vegetable salts and juices are converted into alkaline carbonates, which tend to counteract acidity.

A good, ripe, raw apple is one of the easiest of vegetable substances for the stomach to deal with, the whole process of its digestion being completed in eighty-five minutes. Gefrard found that the "pulps of roasted apples mixed in a wine quart of faire water, and labored together until it comes to be as apples and ale—which we call lambswool—never faileth in certain diseases of the raines, which myself hath often proved, and gained thereby both crowns and credit." "The paring of an apple, cut somewhat thick, and the inside whereof is laid to hot, burning or running eyes at night, when the party goes to bed, and is tied, or bound to the same, doth help the trouble very speedily, and contrary to expectation an excellent secret."

A poultice made of rotten apples is of very common use in Lincolnshire for the cure of weak or rheumatic eyes. Likewise in the Hotel des Invalides at Paris, an apple poultice is used commonly for inflamed eyes, the apple being roasted and its pulp applied over the eyes without any intervening substance. Long ago it was said apples are easily and speedily digested, and a modern maxim teaches that "If you eat an apple going to bed, the doctor then will beg his bread."—London Hospital.

What to Eat at Night.

The true course is to begin with just one or two mouthfuls the last thing before going to bed. And this should be light food, easily digested. No cake or pastry should be tolerated. One mouthful of cold roast beef, cold lamb, cold chicken and a little crust of bread will do to begin with, or, what is better yet, a spoonful or two of condensed milk (not the sweetened that comes in cans) in three times as much warm water. Into this cut half a pared peach and two or three little squares of bread, the whole to be one-fourth or one sixth of what would be a light lunch.

Increase this very gradually, until at the end of a month or six weeks the patient may indulge in a bowl of milk, two peaches, with a half hard roll or a crust of home made bread. When peaches are gone take baked apples with the milk till strawberries come, and eat the latter till peaches return again. This is the secret of health and vitality. We often work until after midnight, but eating the comfortable meal is the last thing we do every night of the year. This is not an untried experiment or one depending on the testimony of a single witness.—American Analyst.

Birds That Appear to Reason.

Frank Buchland gives several curious instances of the special habits of some birds in procuring their food. The blackbirds, thrushes, etc., carry snails considerable distances for the purpose of breaking their shells against some rock or stone. Thomas Edward, the Scottish naturalist, describes gulls and ravens flying to a great height with crab or other shellfish, and letting them fall on stones in order to smash the shells; and, if they do not break on the first attempt, they pick them up again and carry them yet higher, repeating the operation again and again till the shell is broken. Ravens often resort to this contrivance. Darwin tells of a bird having been repeatedly seen to hop on a poppy stem, and shake the head with his bill till many seeds were scattered, when it sprang to the ground and ate up the seeds.—Month.

A Thought for Aspiring M. D.'s.

Professor Buchanan, of the Glasgow university, has just made a statement which should "give pause" to parents who think of making doctors of their sons. Speaking at the opening of the medical session of the Glasgow university, he declared that of every hundred young men who entered the medical classes with a view to qualifying in surgery and medicine only one of that original hundred issued from the ordeal of study and examination a full blown medical man. One per cent.—London Tit-Bits.

The Requisites of a Husband.

A certain pretty little girl, with great big serious blue eyes, was telling her companion on the street car why she was going to marry George. "You see, Maime," she said, "George is awfully good looking; he always sends me flowers when we go to the theatre; he never seems to be so shockingly busy, don't you know; he's got plenty of money, and he does just like I tell him." Prospective husbands, there is a catologue of the requisites.—Memphis Times.

HISTORY OF SUGAR

Some Rude Methods of Preparation by the Ancient Races.

THEORIES OF ITS INTRODUCTION.

Progress of the Industry.—Used as Medicine by the Greeks and Romans.—Present Annual Consumption.

Heredotus, one of the earliest writers of whose works there is any record, informs us that a tribe in Africa called the Zygantes had, "besides honey of bees, a much greater quantity made by man." It also stated that Nearchus, the chief admiral of Alexander the Great, "discovered concerning canes that they make honey without bees." Very ancient races, therefore, were acquainted with the fact that certain canes yield sweet juices, and being ignorant of any methods of purifying these juices, their sugar could not be got to crystallize and resembled honey in consistency as well as in taste. Megasthenes, however, writes much later concerning "the India stone, sweeter than figs or honey," so that by this time some rude method of crystallizing or solidifying the juice had been discovered. The early Jewish historians make no mention of sugar, the only sweet substance habitually used by the Hebrews being honey; but Isaiah speaks of "sweet cane," and there is a disputed allusion to it in the Song of Solomon.

It was not until about the commencement of the Christian era that sugar was spoken of by an appropriate name. "In India and Arabia Felix," writes Dioscorides, "a kind of concrete honey is called saccharon." This term is evidently adapted from the Arabic assokar or shuker, which itself is derived from the Sanscrit sharkara. Speaking of names, it is rather odd that the Hebrew word for being intoxicated is shacar, a word which is evidently closely connected with the Arabic. It is interesting, too, when we remember the ready conversion of sweet liquids into alcohol. There seems to be little doubt that the origin of the manufacture of sugar must be sought for in India and Arabia.

Apart from the evidence of Dioscorides we are always disposed to trust Pliny, to whom we are indebted for so much information concerning the manners and customs of the ancients. In Holland's translation, book 12, chapter 8, we read: "As for sugar, there is of it in Arabia, but the best cometh out of India. A kind of honie it is, gathered and candied in certaine canes—white, this is, like gumme (Arabicke), and brittle betweene a man's teeth. The graines hereof, when they are at the biggest, exceed not a filberd nutte, and serve for physicke."

Sugar, as known to the ancients, was doubtless far less palatable than it is now. In preparing it the canes and the roots were frequently boiled, so that certain bitter and aromatic principles must needs have been extracted. The quality imparted to the sugar by this process might have determined its use for medicinal purposes. It is certain that sugar was only regarded as a sort of medicine for several centuries, and confirmation of this statement may be found in the fact that it is rarely mentioned, except by physicians and learned men, nor with tolerable precision except by the former.

The Greeks and Romans used sugar as a medicament almost entirely, and it is occasionally alluded to by the physicians of the Augustan age. During the Seventh century the empire of the Saracens was scarcely inferior to that of Rome in the times of her greatest prosperity and, we may add, rapacity. The conquered western Asia, overran northern Africa and carried their arms into the south of Europe. To these semi-barbaric Saracens Europe was indebted for the manufacture of sugar—a commodity the consumption of which may now almost be taken as a measure of a nation's civilization.

DID THE CRUSADERS INTRODUCE IT?

There are many who attribute the introduction of sugar to the Crusaders. But sugar has undoubtedly been cultivated in Spain for near 1,000 years, and it has been asked, since the Crusaders were collected from all parts of Europe, how is it that Spain was the only country favored with this valuable commodity? Of course the Crusaders did find sugar in Syria, and they may have assisted in making it better known on their return to Europe. We read in the history of the second crusade that Richard Cœur de Lion captured seven camels laden with sugar, and that his knights found "sweet honied cannes called zuera." These they gathered and sucked and were "much pleased with the sweet taste thereof, with which they could scarcely be satisfied."

It was long before the mechanical arts were applied to the preparation of sugar and longer still before any method of clarifying the juice of the cane was discovered. The use of alkalies is believed to be an invention of the Moors who settled in Spain. Sugar appears to have been very little known in England till the Fourteenth century. In 1329 the Lord Chamberlain of Scotland speaks of loaves of sugar, which were sold at one ounce of silver per pound, a price equivalent to about $4 of our money. The manufacture was not carried on in Great Britain at this time, but small supplies were imported from Venice, where sugar refining had already become an important industry. Although old Harrison, the chronicler, speaks of sugar and wine as being a common drink among the upper classes during the Sixteenth century, it is probable that sugar did not become an article of ordinary consumption until the middle of the Seventeenth century.

The sugar industry was started in Barbados by some English merchants in 1648. It is commonly supposed that the cane was introduced into the Western hemisphere by the Portuguese and other early European settlers, but it is decidedly stated by the first explorers in these regions that the aborigines of Virginia and other parts of America prepared sugar from the maple juice and also from a native variety of sugar cane. The Spaniards did, however, transplant the cane, which they cultivated in their own country, and to them must certainly be ascribed the introduction of the sugar industry into Madeira and the Canaries.

The history of sugar cultivation is one of successive migrations westward, due chiefly to the rapid exhaustion of the soil inseparable from the cultivation of the cane with slave labor, and to an ignorant carelessness in the treatment of the land. The opening up of new highways of commerce, the facilities of communication and intercourse among nations, the more scientific methods of cultivation and processes of manufacture, and the fresh sources from which sugar can now be derived, have all contributed to the phenomenal development of trade in and consumption of this commodity which has characterized the present century.

In 1700 the amount of sugar consumed in Great Britain was 10,000 tons; in 1800 it had risen to 150,000 tons, while in 1885 the amount of sugar consumed was 1,100,000 tons.—American Analyst.

THE NEW BALLOT LAW

AN ACT TO AMEND SECTIONS 1185, 1186, 1187, 1188, 1189, 1190, 1191, 1192, 1193, 1194, 1195, 1196, 1197, 1198, 1199, 1200, 1201, 1202, 1203, 1204, 1205, 1206, 1207, 1208, 1209, 1210, 1211, 1212, 1257, 1258, AND 1259 OF THE POLITICAL CODE, AND TO ADD FOUR NEW SECTIONS THERETO, TO BE NUMBERED 1213, 1214, 1215 AND 1216, ALL IN RELATION TO THE CONDUCT OF ELECTIONS IN THIS STATE.

The People of the State of California, represented in Senate and Assembly, do enact as follows:

SECTION 1. Section 1185 of the Political Code is hereby amended to read as follows:

Sec. 1185. All ballots cast in elections for public officers within this State shall be printed and distributed at public expense as hereinafter provided. The printing of general tickets and cards of instruction to electors of each county, and the delivery of the same to the election officers, shall be a county charge, the payment of which shall be provided for in the same manner as the payment of other county expenses; and the printing and delivering of "municipal tickets," and also in case of separate elections for city, city and county, or town officers, the printing and delivering of cards of instruction shall be a charge upon the respective city, city and county or town in which such "municipal tickets" and cards of instruction are to be used, the payment of which shall be provided for in the same manner as the payment of other city, city and county or town expenses.

SEC. 2. Section 1186 of the Political Code is hereby amended to read as follows:

Sec. 1186. Any convention, as hereinafter defined, held for the purpose of making nominations for public office, and also electors, to the number hereinafter specified, may nominate candidates for public offices to be filled by election within the State. A convention, within the meaning of this act, is an organized assemblage of delegates representing a political party which, at the last election before the holding of such convention, polled at least 3 per cent. of the entire vote of the State, county, district or other political division for which the nomination is made; provided, that in any county, township, city or district wherein no general election shall have been held after its organization, a convention of any party polling at least 3 per cent. of the votes cast in the precincts composing such county, township, city or district shall have the same power, and its nominations the same effect as though such county, township, city or district had been organized before the next preceding general election.

SEC. 3. Section 1187 of the Political Code is hereby amended to read as follows:

Sec. 1187. All nominations made by any such convention shall be certified as follows: The certificate of nomination, which must be in writing, shall contain the name of each person nominated, his residence and the office for which he is nominated, and shall designate the party or principle which such convention represents. It shall be signed by the chairman and secretary of such convention, who shall add to their signatures their respective places of residence, and make oath before an officer authorized to administer the same, that the matter stated in such certificate is true to the best of their knowledge and belief, and a certificate of the oath shall be annexed to the certificate of nomination.

SEC. 4. Section 1188 of the Political Code is hereby amended to read as follows:

Sec. 1188. A candidate for public office may be nominated otherwise than by a convention in the manner following: A certificate of nomination containing the name of the candidate to be nominated, with the other information required to be given in the certificate provided for in Section 1187 of this code, shall be signed by electors residing within the district or political division for which candidates are to be presented, equal in number to at least 3 per cent. of the entire vote cast at the last preceding election in the state, district or political division for which the nomination is to be made; provided, that 1,000 signatures shall be sufficient for the nomination of a candidate for any office in the State. Said signatures need not all be appended to one paper, but each signer shall add to his signature his place of residence, giving the street and number, when he resides in a city. One of the signers of each such certificate shall swear that the statements therein made are true to the best of his knowledge and belief, and a certificate of such oath shall be annexed. Such a certificate, when made as above prescribed, shall have the same effect as a certificate of nomination made by a party convention.

SEC. 5. Section 1189 of the Political Code is hereby amended to read as follows:

Sec. 1189. Certificates of nomination shall be filed with the Secretary of State for the nomination of candidates for offices to be filled by the electors of the entire State, or for members of the State Board of Equalization, State Board of Railroad Commissioners, or House of Representatives. Certificates of nomination shall be filed with the Clerk or Secretary of the legislative body of any incorporated city or town for the nomination of any candidate for an office under the government of any city or town, to be filled by the electors of such city or town. For all other nominations to public offices, certificates of nomination shall be filed with the Clerks of the respective counties wherein the offices are to be filled by the electors; and where the district or political division embraces more than one county, such certificate must be filed with the Clerk of the county in which the candidate resides, and the name of each such candidate as specified in the certificate of nomination shall be certified by said County Clerk to the County Clerks of the other counties within the district or political division, not less than fifteen days before the day of election.

SEC. 6. Section 1190 of the Political Code is hereby amended to read as follows:

Sec. 1190. No certificate of nomination shall contain the name of more than one candidate for each office to be filled. No person shall join in nominating, under the provisions of this code, more than one nominee for each office to be filled, and no person who has voted in a convention for or against a candidate for any office shall join in nominating, in any manner, any other nominee for that office, and no person shall accept a nomination to more than one office.

SEC. 7. Section 1191 of the Political Code is hereby amended to read as follows:

Sec. 1191. The Secretary of State shall preserve in his office for the period of two years all certificates of nomination filed therein under the provisions of this code, and each County Clerk shall preserve in his office for a like period all certificates of nomination filed therein under the provisions of this code, and each Clerk or Secretary of the legislative body of any incorporated city or town shall for a like period preserve in his office all certificates of nomination filed therein under the provisions of this code.

SEC. 8. Section 1192 of the Political Code is hereby amended to read as follows:

Sec. 1192. Certificate of nomination required to be filed with the Secretary of State shall be filed not more than sixty days and not less than forty days before the day fixed by law for the election of the persons in nomination when the nomination is made by convention, and not more than sixty days and not less than thirty days before the day of election when the nomination is made by electors as provided in Section 1188 of this code. Certificates of nomination required to be filed with the County Clerks, or with the Clerk or Secretary of the legislative body of any city or town, shall be filed not more than fifty nor not less than thirty days before the day of election, when the nomination is made by a convention, and not more than fifty days nor less than twenty days before the day of election when the nomination is made by electors. Should a vacancy in the list of nominees of a convention occur, such vacancy may be filled by the convention, or if it has delegated to a committee the power to fill vacancies, such committee may, upon the occurring of such vacancy, proceed to fill the same; provided, that no nomination shall be made or certified at a period before the day of election less than the minimum number of days provided for filing certificates of nomination made under this code. The chairman and secretary of the convention, or of such committee, shall thereupon make and file with the proper officer a certificate setting forth the cause of the vacancy, the name of the person nominated, the office for which he was nominated, the name of the person for whom the new nominee is to be substituted, the fact that the committee was authorized to fill vacancies, and such further information as is required to be given in an original certificate of nomination. When a certificate to fill any vacancy shall be filed with the Secretary of State, he shall in certifying the nomination to the various County Clerks, insert the name of the person who has been thus nominated to fill a vacancy in the place of that of the original nominee. Any person whose name has been presented as a candidate, may, at least five days before the making of the publication of the nominations prescribed in this section, cause his name to be withdrawn from nomination by filing with the Secretary of State and County Clerk his request therefor in writing, signed by him and acknowledged before the County Clerk of the county in which he resides, and no name so withdrawn shall be printed on the ballot.

SEC. 9. Section 1193 of the Political Code is hereby amended to read as follows:

Sec. 1193. Not less than twenty-five days before an election to fill any public office, the Secretary of State shall certify to the County Clerk of each county within which any of the electors may by law vote for candidates for such office, the names of each person nominated for such office, as specified in the certificate of nomination filed with the Secretary of State.

SEC. 10. Section 1194 of the Political Code is hereby amended to read as follows:

Sec. 1194. At least ten days before an election to fill any public office, the County Clerk of each county shall cause to be published, in at least two newspapers of general circulation within the county, the nominations to office certified to him by the Secretary of State, and also all those filed with the County Clerk. He shall make not less than two such publications in each of such newspapers before election day, one of such publications being made upon the last day upon which such newspaper is issued before the day of election. The list of nominations published by the County Clerks of the respective counties shall be arranged in the order and form in which they will be printed upon the ballot. The Clerk or the Secretary of the legislative body of any incorporated city or town with whom the names of any candidates have been filed shall publish in the same manner the list of nominations filed with him; but where only one newspaper is printed in any county, city or town, then publication in such newspaper shall be deemed sufficient, and where no newspaper is printed in such county, city or town, publication shall be made through any newspaper designated by the Board of Supervisors of said county, or the legislative body of such city or town, and by posting copies of the ballot in three of the most public places in such county, city or town not less than ten days before the day of election.

SEC. 11. Section 1195 of the Political Code is hereby amended to read as follows:

Sec. 1195. Whenever a proposed constitutional amendment, or other question, is to be submitted to the people of the State for the popular vote, the Secretary of State shall duly, and not less than twenty-five days before election, certify the same to the Clerk of each county of the State; and the Clerk of each county shall include the same in publication provided for in Section 1194 of this code.

SEC. 12. Section 1196 of the Political Code is hereby amended to read as follows:

Sec. 1196. Except as in this code otherwise provided, it shall be the duty of the County Clerk of each county to provide printed ballots for every election of public officers, except elections for city or town officers, in which electors or any of the electors within the county participate, and to cause to be printed in the appropriate ballot the name of every candidate whose name has been certified to, or filed with the County Clerk, in the manner provided for in this code. Ballots other than those printed by the respective County Clerks, or the Clerk or Secretary of the legislative body of any incorporated city or town, according to the provisions of this code, shall not be cast nor counted at any election. It shall be the duty of the County Clerk of any consolidated city and county to provide separate ballots for every election for city and county officers in which the electors or any of the electors of such city or county participate, and to cause to be printed in such separate ballots the name of every candidate for a city and county office, whose name has been filed with the said County Clerk in the manner provided in this code. It shall be the duty of the Clerk or Secretary of the legislative body of any incorporated city or town to provide separate ballots for every election for city or town officers in which the electors, or any of the electors, of such city or town participate, and to cause to be printed in such separate ballots the name of every candidate whose name has been filed with such Clerk or Secretary in the manner provided for in this code. All ballots shall be of the necessary size and shall contain the names of all the candidates, together with the necessary blank spaces hereinafter provided for, and shall be printed on tinted paper furnished by the Secretary of State. It shall be the duty of the Secretary of State to obtain and keep on hand a sufficient supply of paper for ballots, and to furnish the same in quantities ordered to any County Clerk, or Clerk or Secretary of the legislative body of any incorporated city or town upon payment by them of the cost of such paper. Such paper shall be water marked with a design to be furnished by the Secretary of State, in such manner that the said water mark shall be plainly discernible on the outside of such ballot when folded according to law. Such design shall be kept secret from all persons not engaged in the preparation, printing or distribution of the paper or ballots until the day of election. Such design shall be changed for each general election, and the same design shall not be used again at any general election within the space of 14 years, but at any special or separate local election paper marked with the design used at the previous election may be used. Nothing in this code contained shall prevent any voter from writing upon his ballot the name of any person for whom he desires to vote for any office, and such vote shall be counted the same as if printed upon the ballot and marked as voted for.

SEC. 13. Section 1197 of the Political Code is hereby amended to read as follows:

Sec. 1197. All ballots printed by County Clerks, other than the separate ballots containing the names of candidates for city and county offices, printed by the County Clerks of consolidated cities and counties shall be headed "General Ticket"; and all ballots printed by County Clerks of consolidated cities and counties, containing the names of candidates for city and county offices, and also all tickets printed by the Clerk or Secretary of the legislative body of any incorporated city or town, shall be headed "Municipal Ticket." Under the heading of all general tickets, the respective number of the Congressional, Senatorial and Assembly district in which such ticket is to be voted shall be printed, together with the following direction to voters: "To vote for a person (stamp) a cross (X) in the square at the right of the name." Opposite the title of each office shall be printed a direction to the voter specifying the number of persons to be voted for for that office, and opposite each constitutional amendment or other question to be voted upon in separate lines the words "yes" and "no." All municipal tickets containing the names of candidates for ward or district offices, in addition to such direction to voters, shall have the number of the ward or district in which such ticket is to be voted printed thereon. All municipal tickets shall be printed upon paper of a different tint from that of the general ticket. On each ballot a perforated line shall extend from top to bottom, one-half inch from the right hand side of such ballot, and upon the half-inch strip thus formed there shall be no printing except the number of the ballot, which shall be upon the back of such strip in such position that it shall appear on the outside when the ballot is folded. The number on each ballot shall be the same as that on the corresponding stub, and the ballots and stubs shall be numbered consecutively in each county. All ballots shall be 18 inches in length and 4½ in width, and as many times such width as shall be necessary to contain the names of all candidates nominated. Where the names of candidates are printed in separate columns such columns shall be separated by heavy rules; and on all ballots the names of candidates shall each be separated by a rule extending to the extreme right of the column. All ballots shall be printed in plain Roman type, and shall contain the name of every candidate whose nomination for any office specified in the ballot has been certified to and filed according to the provisions of this code, and no other name; [and there shall be added to all the names of candidates their party or political organizations.] The names of the candidates for each office shall be arranged under the designation of the office, in alphabetical order, according to surnames. [Except that the names of candidates for the office of electors for President and Vice-President shall be arranged in groups as presented in the several certificates of nomination, and the voter may vote for the whole of said group by making one mark after such group.] There shall be left at the end of the list of candidates for each office as many blank spaces as there are persons to be elected to such office in which the voter may insert the name of any person not printed upon the ballot for whom he desires to vote as candidate for such office; and the names and blank spaces on the whole ticket shall be consecutively numbered, the figures being placed on the left hand side of such names and blank spaces. There shall be a margin on the right-hand side of the spaces, at least one-half of an inch wide, so that the voter may clearly indicate, in the way to be hereafter pointed out, the candidate and candidates for whom he wishes to cast his ballot; the county, city or town in which each candidate resides may be printed in small type on the right-hand side of his name. Whenever any question is to be submitted to the vote of the people, it shall also be printed upon the ballot in such a manner as to enable the electors to vote upon such question in the manner hereinafter provided. At the head of each ballot shall be printed in separate lines the names of all political parties which have filed certificates of nomination of candidates in accordance with Sections 1186 and 1187 of this code, thus: "Regular Republican Ticket", (straight); opposite the names of each party, and on the same line therewith, there shall be a margin similar to that herein required, to be left opposite the name of each candidate, in which the voter may place the mark in the manner specified in Section 1200 of this code, if he desires to vote for all of the candidates of such party, but a ballot so marked shall not be counted if it [be stamped in any other place] except to indicate a vote or votes upon a constitutional amendment or other question.

SEC. 14. Section 1198 of the Political Code is hereby amended to read as follows:

Sec. 1198. All ballots, when printed, shall be bound in stub-books of 100 ballots each. A record of the number of ballots printed by them shall be kept by the respective County Clerks, and by the Clerk or Secretary of the legislative body of each incorporated city or town.

SEC. 15. Section 1199 of the Political Code is hereby amended to read as follows:

Sec. 1199. The County Clerk of each county shall provide for each election precinct in the county not less than one hundred general tickets for every fifty or fraction of fifty electors registered in the election precinct; and in case of a consolidated city and county, an equal number of municipal tickets when any city and county officers are to be elected; and the Clerk or Secretary of the legislative body of any incorporated city or town shall furnish a like number of municipal tickets when any city or town officer is to be elected.

SEC. 16. Section 1200 of the Political Code is hereby amended to read as follows:

Sec. 1200. Whenever it shall appear by affidavit that an error or omission has occurred in the publication of the name or description of the candidates nominated for office, or in the printing of the ballots, the Superior Court of the county, or the Judge thereof, shall, upon application by any elector, by order, require the County Clerk to correct such error, or to show cause why such error should not be corrected.

SEC. 17. Section 1201 of the Political Code is hereby amended to read as follows:

Sec. 1201. Before the opening of the polls at any election within any county, the County Clerk of the county shall cause to be delivered to the Boards of Election of each election precinct which is within the county, and in which the election is to be held, at the polling place of the election precinct, the proper number of general tickets to be used in the election precinct, in sealed packages, with marks on the outside, clearly designating the precinct or polling place for which they are intended, and the number of ballots inclosed, and in case of a consolidated city and county, also a like number of municipal tickets; and the Clerk or Secretary of any incorporated city or town shall in like manner cause to be delivered the proper number of municipal tickets. The County Clerk, Clerk or Secretary shall prepare a receipt for each polling-place, enumerating the packages and stating the time and day and date when the same were delivered by him to the Inspectors of Election. The Inspectors of Election shall sign said receipt upon receipt of the packages, which shall forthwith be returned and filed. The County Clerk, Clerk and Secretary respectively shall have authority to employ such messengers as may be necessary to insure the safe and expeditious delivery of the ballots to the Inspectors or Judges of Election, as provided in this code, and the Board of Supervisors, or other board or body having the control of elections, shall allow such messengers a reasonable compensation for their services, to be paid as other election expenses are paid. In case of the prevention of an election in any precinct by the loss or the destruction of the ballots intended for that precinct, the Inspector or other election officer for that precinct shall make an affidavit setting forth the fact, swear to the same before an officer authorized to administer oaths, and transmit it to the Governor of this State. Upon receipt of such affidavit the Governor may order a new election in such precinct, and upon the application of any candidate for any office to be voted for by the electors of such precinct the Governor shall order a new election in such precinct.

SEC. 18. Section 1202 of the Political Code is hereby amended to read as follows:

Sec. 1202. At the same time and in the same manner as Inspectors and Judges of Election are now appointed in this State, two ballot clerks for each election precinct in the State shall be appointed, who shall be duly sworn to have charge of the ballots on the day of election, and to furnish them to the voters in the manner hereinafter provided. Such ballot clerks shall possess the same qualifications, and shall be paid the same compensation, as Inspectors of Elections. In making appointments of such ballot clerks, one of them shall be taken from the political party that polled the largest number of votes at the last preceding election and the other from the party that polled the next largest number of votes at such election. They shall act as additional Clerks of Election when the polls are closed, and they shall serve until the votes are counted and the returns are signed; provided, that whenever a general and municipal election shall be held at the same time, there shall be appointed one additional Inspector, one additional Judge, and two additional clerks in the manner now provided by law.

SEC. 19. Section 1203 of the Political Code is hereby amended to read as follows:

Sec. 1203. All officers upon whom is imposed by the law of the State the duty of designating polling places shall cause such polling places to be furnished with a ballot-box, which shall be marked on the outside, "general tickets," and when any city, city and county or town officers are to be elected a second ballot-box, to be marked on the outside "municipal tickets," and shall also provide sufficient number of booths or compartments, and so arrange that voters may conveniently mark their ballots, so that in the marking thereof they may be screened from the observation of others, and a guard-rail shall be so constructed and placed that only persons actually engaged in voting can approach within six feet of the ballot-boxes and of such booths or compartments. The arrangements shall to such that neither the ballot-boxes nor the box, booth or compartments shall be hidden from the view of those just outside the said guard-rail. The number of such booths or compartments shall not be less than one for every fifty electors qualified to vote in the precinct. No person other than electors engaged in receiving, preparing or depositing their ballots shall be permitted to be within said rail before the closing of the polls except by authority of the Board of Election, and then only for the purpose of keeping order and enforcing the law. Each of said voting booths or compartments shall be kept provided with proper supplies and conveniences for marking the ballots.

SEC. 20. Section 1204 of the Political Code is hereby amended to read as follows:

Sec. 1204. Any person qualified to vote shall give his name and address to one of the ballot clerks, who shall then, in an audible tone of voice, announce the same, and if the ballot clerk finds the name on the register, he shall in like manner repeat the name and address, whereupon such challenge may be interposed as provided in Section 1250 of this code. If the challenge be overruled, the ballot clerk shall give him a ticket, and the clerk shall write on the register, opposite the name of the voter, the number of the general ticket given him, and also the number of the municipal ticket given him, when any city, city and county or town officer is to be elected; and the voter shall be allowed to enter the place inclosed by the guard-rail, as above provided. The ballot clerk shall give him but one general ticket, and where any city, city and county or town officers are to be elected, also one municipal ticket; and only one ballot of each kind.

SEC. 21. Section 1205 of the Political Code is hereby amended to read as follows:

Sec. 1205. On receipt of his ballot the elector shall forthwith, and without leaving the inclosed space, retire alone to one of the places, booths or compartments provided to prepare his ballot. He shall prepare his ballot by marking a cross after the name of the person or persons for whom he intends to vote, thus, X; provided, however, that any elector who desires to vote for an entire party ticket, may mark a cross as above described against the political designation of such party, and shall then be deemed to have voted for all the persons named upon such party ticket for any of the officers, or for or against any proposed amendment or other question submitted to the vote of the people, by marking in the appropriate margin, a cross (X) against the answer which he desires to give. Such marking shall be done only with a stamp, which shall be the property of the State, and shall be provided by the officers who are by this code required to furnish election supplies, for each booth or compartment provided for the marking and preparation of ballots. Before leaving such booth or compartment the elector shall fold his ballot in such a manner that the number of the ballot shall appear on the outside thereof, without displaying the marks on the face thereof, and shall keep it folded until he has voted. Having folded his ballot the voter shall deliver it folded to the Inspector, who shall announce in an audible tone of voice the name of the voter and the number of his ballot. The ballot clerk having the register in charge, if he finds the number to correspond with the number marked opposite the voter's name on the register, shall in like manner repeat the name and number, and shall mark opposite the name the word "voted." The Inspector shall then separate the number from the ballot, and shall deposit the ballot in the box. The numbers of all ballots voted shall be immediately destroyed.

SEC. 22. Section 1206 of the Political Code is hereby amended to read as follows:

Sec. 1206. Not more than one person shall be permitted to occupy any one booth at one time, and no person shall remain in or occupy a booth longer than necessary to prepare his ballot, and in no event longer than ten minutes.

SEC. 23. Section 1207 of the Political Code is hereby amended to read as follows:

Sec. 1207. Any voter who shall spoil a ballot shall return such spoiled ballot to the ballot clerk and receive another one in its place, one at a time, not to exceed three in all. All the ballots thus returned shall be immediately canceled, and, with those not distributed to the voters, shall be returned with the registered list and ballots as now provided in Sections 1253 and 1254 of this code. Every elector who does not vote the ballot delivered to him shall, before leaving the polling place, return such ballot to the Ballot Clerks having charge of the ballots, who shall immediately cancel the same and return them in the same manner as spoiled ballots. The Ballot Clerks shall account for the ballots delivered to them by returning a sufficient number of unused ballots to make up, when added to the number of official ballots cast and the number of spoiled ballots returned, the number of ballots given to them, and it shall be the duty of the officers receiving such returned ballots to compel such an accounting.

SEC. 24. Section 1208 of the Political Code is hereby amended to read as follows:

Sec. 1208. Any elector who declares, under oath, to the presiding election officer that he cannot read, and that by reason thereof, or that by reason of physical disability, he is unable to mark his ballot, shall, upon request, receive the assistance of any one of the officers of election that he may choose in the marking thereof, and such officer shall thereafter give no information regarding the same.

SEC. 25. Section 1209 of the Political Code is hereby amended to read as follows:

Sec. 1209. No member of the Board of Election shall deposit in the ballot-box any ballot from which the slip containing the number of the ballot has not been removed by the Inspector.

SEC. 26. Section 1210 of the Political Code is hereby amended to read as follows:

Sec. 1210. The County Clerk of each county, or in case of separate city or town elections, the Clerk or Secretary of the legislative body of such city or town shall cause to be printed on plain white paper, without water-mark or indorsements (except the words "sample ballot") at least as many copies of the form of ballot provided for use in each voting precinct as there shall be registered voters in such precinct. Such copy shall be designated "sample ballots," and shall be furnished to registered voters at the office of such Clerk or Secretary five days before the day fixed by law for such election, and at any time during such five days; provided, that not more than one sample ballot shall be furnished to any one voter. Such Clerk or Secretary shall cause to be printed, in large, clear type, on cards, instructions for the guidance of electors in obtaining and marking their ballots. He shall furnish twelve such cards to the Board of Election in each election precinct in his county, at the same time and in the same manner as the printed ballots and sample ballots. The Board of Election shall post at least one of such cards in each booth or compartment provided for the preparation of ballots, and not less than three of such cards at other places in and about the polling places on the day of election. Sections 1214 and 1215 of this code and Section 61 of the Penal Code shall also be printed on each of said cards.

SEC. 27. Section 1211 of the Political Code is hereby amended to read as follows:

Sec. 1211. In canvassing the votes any ballot which is not made as provided in this act shall be void, and shall not be counted; but each such ballot must be preserved and returned with the other ballots. Any name written upon a ballot shall be counted for the office under which it is written, whether or not a cross is marked after it. If a voter marks more names than there are persons to be elected to an office, or if for any reason it is impossible to determine the voter's choice for any office to be filled, his ballot shall not be counted for such office.

SEC. 28. Section 1212 of the Political Code is hereby amended to read as follows:

Sec. 1212. Any person entitled to vote at a general election held within this State shall, on the day of such election, be entitled to absent himself from any service or employment in which he is then engaged or employed for the period of two consecutive hours, between the time of opening and the time of closing the polls; and such voter shall not, because of so absenting himself, be liable to any penalty, nor shall any deduction be made on account of such absence from his usual salary or wages.

[Amend Section 4257 of the Political Code to read as follows:

After the lists are thus signed, the board must proceed to open the ballots and count and ascertain the number of votes cast for each person voted for. All the ballots must be taken out of the ballot-box, one at a time, and opened by one of the members of the board, and as so taken out, the straight ballots must be placed in separate piles, according to their respective ticket headings, vignettes, or other designations in manner as follows, to wit: All the straight ballots of each such party must be placed in a separate pile, and straight undesignated ballots must be placed in a separate pile in a like manner. When all the straight ballots shall have been so placed in piles, the number of ballots in each such pile must be carefully, correctly and distinctly counted aloud by a member of the board, in presence of the board and of the bystanders, whereupon an official record must be made by each clerk of the total number of ballots in each such pile. Immediately thereafter all straight ballots, according to their respective headings, vignettes or other designations, shall be distinctly read by such clerks, and the same total of such pile so made by clerks shall be read in connection with the office for which he is a candidate, and said total shall be so credited to such candidate. Immediately thereafter all straight ballots must be by one of the Judges strung upon one string in such a manner that all the straight ballots of each party shall be in direct succession and immediate proximity upon said string, and all such straight ballots thereupon be securely bound together by said string and replaced in the ballot-box.

All the ballots, other than straight ballots, of each separate political or other party must be placed in a pile. When all the ballots shall have been so placed in a pile the number of ballots in such pile must be carefully, correctly and distinctly counted aloud by a member of the board and in the presence of the board and of the bystanders, whereupon an official record must be made by each clerk of the total number of ballots in such pile. Immediately thereafter all the ballots, other than straight ballots must by one of the Judges strung upon one string in such a manner that all the ballots, other than straight ballots, shall be in direct succession and immediate proximity upon said string; and all such ballots, other than straight ballots, shall thereupon be securely bound together in a separate ballot-box. Immediately thereafter such pile of ballots, other than straight ballots, must be freed from such twine or other fastening without removal from the ballot-box, and such ballots must be taken out one at a time by one of the members of the board, and the name of each person marked in the ballots as voted for shall be distinctly read in connection with the office for which he is a candidate. After the ballots, other than straight ballots, have been so counted, and an official record thereof mentioned, made, all ballots rejected for illegality must be strung upon said string of ballots, other than straight ballots; whereupon all the ballots thus strung shall be securely bound and be replaced in the ballot-box.

SEC. 29. Section 1254 of the Political Code is hereby amended to read as follows:

Sec. 1254. Each clerk must write down each office to be filled and the name of each person marked in each ballot as voted for to fill such office, and keep the number of votes by tallies as they are read aloud.

SEC. 30. Section 1255 of the Political Code is hereby amended to read as follows:

Sec. 1255. The ballots, as soon as the names marked on them as voted for are read, must be strung on a string by one of the judges, and must not thereafter be examined by any person, but must, as soon as all are counted, be carefully sealed in a strong envelope, each member of the board writing his name across the seal.

SEC. 31. Four new sections are hereby added to the Political Code, to be numbered, respectively, 1213, 1214, 1215 and 1216, as follows:

Sec. 1213. No person shall falsely make, or fraudulently deface or destroy any certificate of nomination, or any part thereof, or like any certificate of nomination, knowing the same or any part thereof to be falsely made, or suppress any certificate of nomination which has been duly filed, or any part thereof, or make, use, keep or furnish to other persons except as in this code so directed, any paper or device to simulate an official ballot paper or device, or to assume to any person not engaged in making, printing or distribution of ballot paper or ballots.

Sec. 1214. No person shall, during an election, remove or destroy any of the supplies or other conveniences placed in the voting booths or compartments, as provided in this code, for the purpose of enabling the voter to prepare his ballot. No person shall, during an election, remove, tear down or deface the cards printed for the instruction of voters.

Sec. 1215. No officer of election shall disclose to any person the name of any candidate for whom any elector has voted. No officer of election, nor any person, shall do any electioneering on election day within one hundred feet of any polling place. No person shall receive any ballot from any polling place before the closing of the poll. No person shall apply for or receive any ballot at any election precinct other than that in which he is entitled to vote. No person shall show his ballot after it is marked to any person in such a way as to reveal the contents thereof, or the name or names of the candidate or candidates for whom he has marked his ballot; nor shall any person, except a member of the board of Election, receive from any voter a ballot folded in such a way as to reveal such ballot, or solicit the voter to show the same; nor shall any person ask another at a polling place for whom he intends to vote. No voter shall receive a ballot from any other person than one of the ballot clerks; nor shall any other person than a ballot clerk deliver a ballot to a voter. No voter shall deliver to the Board of Election, or to any member thereof, any ballot other than the one he has received from the ballot clerk. No voter shall place any mark upon his ballot by which it may be afterward identified as the one voted by him.

Sec. 1216. In all counties, and cities and counties, in this State, having a Registrar of Voters and a Board of Election Commissioners, the powers conferred and the duties imposed by this code upon the County Clerks and other officers, in relation to matters of election and polling places, shall be exercised and performed by such Registrar of Voters and Board of Election Commissioners, and all certificates of nomination required by this code to be made to County Clerks shall be made to the Registrar of Voters.

Notice of Executor's Sale

NOTICE IS HEREBY GIVEN THAT IN pursuance of a power to sell, contained in the Last Will and Testament of John Allen Hannah, deceased, (which last will and testament was duly admitted to probate,) the undersigned, the Executor of the last will and testament of said deceased, will sell at private sale, to the highest bidder for cash, lawful money of the United States, and subject to confirmation by the Superior Court of the County of Inyo, State of California, on and after TUESDAY, the 8th day of March, 1892, and within six months thereafter, all the right, title, interest and estate of the said John Allen Hannah, deceased, at the time of his death, and all the right, title and interest that the said estate of John Allen Hannah deceased, has, by operation of law or otherwise, acquired other than or in addition to, that of the said John Allen Hannah at the time of his death in and to those certain lots, pieces, or parcels of land situate, lying and being in the County of Inyo, State of California, and particularly described as follows, to wit:

The South half of the South-east quarter and the South half of the south-west quarter of Section No. 10, and the North-east quarter of Section No. 15, all in Township No. 16 South, Range No. 34 East, M. D. M., containing 320 acres.

An undivided one-half interest of in and to that certain lot, piece, or parcel of land situate, lying and being in the said County of Inyo and particularly described as follows, to wit: Commencing at the South-east corner of the south-east quarter of North-east quarter of Section No. 13, in Township No. 13 South, Range No. 35 East, M. D. M., and running thence West eleven chains and 98-100, thence North-east following the meanderings of the bed of the Creek along its North branch to Edwards street, in the town of Independence, thence following said Edwards street along its West line to the place of beginning, six and 80-100 acres; also lot No. 4 in Block No. 9 in the town of Independence, all constituting what is known as the Reddy place.

Lots Nos. 2, 4, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11 and 12, in Block No. 29, in the town of Independence, in the said County of Inyo, as the same appears by the official plat of the said town of Independence, now on file in the office of the County Recorder of said Inyo county, having been the residence of said John A. Hahhah, deceased, at the time of his death.

Lots Nos. 2 and 4, in Block No. 22, in the town of Independence

COURT NOTES.

Geo. M. Gill, Superior Judge.

FRIDAY, July 15, 1892.

J. G. Dodge vs. F. H. Austin et als.—Filed alias summons.

John black vs. A. Lagier—Filed satisfaction.

SATURDAY, July 16, 1892.

People vs. John J. Morton—Filed citation.

MONDAY, July 28, 1892.

Estate of Henrietta Vagt deceased—Filed claims of Wm. F. Matlack and J. G. Smith.

Jake Miller returned from a trip to Carson last Monday.

G. L. Drake of Bishop spent several days in town this week.

District Attorney Forbes has been occupied at Big Pine during the week on the Academy cases.

The Independence Track Association will break ground on the construction of their new course next week.

Mr. and Mrs. Frank Fitzgerald returned home last Monday after a week's visit at Independence.

The full text of the new ballot law will be found on another page. Every voter should read it carefully.

Wm. Withrow and Jack Wilson came up from Lone Pine on Wednesday and visited for a couple of days.

Word from Miss Mary Mulholland at Oakland to her mother on Wednesday announced her safe arrival in the windy city.

Mrs. Church and children arrived home at the end of last week to spend the summer at Independence.

It is reported on good authority that the sale of the soda works at Keeler to an English syndicate has been successfully consummated.

Fred Holbert and Jerry Mairs started for Monache on Wednesday on a fishing and camping expedition. They will probably be gone about a month.

Miss Lena Thomsen arrived home from Williams, Colusa county, last Friday, where she had been visiting for some time with her brother and sister-in-law.

It is reported that Palo Alto, the great trotting stallion, died a few days ago at the ranch from which he was named and upon which he shed so much glory.

Mrs. and Mrs. W. M. Richards of Keeler, accompanied by Miss Sarah James, visited Independence early in the week. The party went north on Tuesday morning's train.

The hay crop throughout the Vally this year is light. Most of the ranchers report about a two-thirds crop. The yield of small grain, however, will probably exceed the average.

Remember that subscriptions on the stock of the Independence Track Association are now due and payable to the Secretary. As work will be commenced next week the funds will be needed.

An excellent programme for a concert has been prepared and will be rendered during Fair week. The drama "Caste" will be presented on the last evening of the Fair. A complete programme will be published in about two weeks.

In the list of professional cards will be found that of Dr. J. S. McQueen of Bishop. The gentleman is a graduate of the Chicago College of Dental Surgery and is thoroughly skilled in his profession. He intends to visit Independence soon and notice of his intended arrival will be given in due time.

Milton Crocker, well known in Inyo county and a former resident of Big Pine, was thrown from a sulky at Bakersfield on Wednesday of last week, receiving such severe injuries that at last reports he was not expected to live. It is with deep regret that the news of the sad accident is received here. Milt. Crocker was a warm-hearted man; a typical old time Californian, and well liked by all who knew him.

In a recent letter to the proprietors, Mr. H. M. Bangs, the druggist at Chatsworth, Ill., says: "I am very much pleased with Chamberlain's Cough Remedy. During the epidemic of la grippe here it took the lead and was very much better liked than other cough medicines." The grip requires precisely the same treatment as a very severe cold, for which this remedy is so efficient. It will promptly loosen a cold and relieve the lungs, soon effecting a cure, while most other medicines in common use for colds only give temporary relief; 50 cent bottles for sale by Good Racing Assured.

BIG PINE, July 21, 1892.

ED. INDEPENDENT:—I have been making a canvass in a small way and I find that quite a number of horses are in training for the coming fair at Independence. At the Birchim ranch in Round Valley the well known gelding "Pete," 2:47, a green three-year-old, a speedy pacer and a two-year-old are in training. Oscar Hilton is working a very promising two-year-old by Bronco, dam by Alex Hall. At Bishop Johnny Underwood is jogging several very promising green horses, notably a full brother to "Pete" and a two-year-old stallion from the same family. Billy Dunn has a two-year old Nutwood stallion that moves very nicely. Nothing is yet being done with Antare or Pickpocket, but that they will both be in it goes without saying. Jack Horton is training—well, don't know just what, but he has several under cover that will keep the boys guessing. Ad. Smith will take Hayseed down and fill up a race or two with him. He says he don't expect to win but he wants a little fun anyway. Ed. Rose is working Judge Kyle and his three-year-old son. They are both new horses here but from their fine appearance they should have a walk-over in their respective races. H. Giles has several gallopers in training, Sagebrush being probably the best of the lot. At Independence I. H. Mulholland has quite a string. The first is the old gelding, Fred B., 2:44; the Benton four-year-old, Inyo; a two-year-old [yearling] Benton filly; a two-year-old by Bronco, dam by Alex Hall, and the little bay running mare, Dream. It is reported that he will also handle the stallion Gibraltar Jr. From the above list it would certainly seem that there will be some excellent racing this fall. There are plenty of good horses and enough rivalry between their respective owners to make them go for blood.

I have just learned that Ed Rose will drive the fine young Benton stallion Patsy, owned by the Mt. Vernon Stock Farm. With scarcely any training the colt showed a three-minute gait last fall, and under the skilful handling of trainer Rose should trot close to 2:30 this year. I have made several inquiries about Bronco but can learn nothing of his owner's intentions. M.

Speed Programme.

The following is the speed programme for the Sixth Annual Fair, beginning Tuesday, September 27th, and ending Friday, September 30th:

FIRST DAY:

RUNNING—Indian Pony race, mile dash; first horse, $15; second $10.

RUNNING—Two-year-olds raised in District, ¼ mile dash; purse, $50.

TROTTING—3:08 class, for horses raised and owned in the District; first horse, $75, second, $25.

SECOND DAY:

TROTTING—For stallions owned in the District three months, 3 in 5, mile heats; first horse, $150; second, $50.

RUNNING—Free for all, mile dash; first horse, $100; second, $50.

LADIES' TOURNAMENT—Prizes, first, $20; second, $15; third, $10; fourth, $5.

THIRD DAY:

TROTTING—Two-year-olds owned in District three months; mile and repeat; first horse, $100; second, $25.

TROTTING—3-minute class, horses raised and owned in the District, mile and repeat; purse, $100.

FOURTH DAY:

TROTTING—Free for all horses owned in the District three months, 3 in 5, mile heats; first horse, $150, second, $50.

RUNNING—Free for all horses owned in the District three months, ½ mile and repeat; purse, $75.

All entries close with the Secretary at 6 o'clock p. m. on Saturday, September 17th, entrance fee, 10 per cent. of purse. In all races 2 or more to enter, 3 or more to start.

Uncomfortably Close.

Quite an excitement was caused at Independence last evening by a sagebrush fire just north of town. There were several acres of very heavy sagebrush adjoining the ranch of E. Robinson and a fire being started in it the flames spread very rapidly, coming within a hundred yards of the school house. There was a slight breeze from the south and this, with the labor of a bucket brigade, prevented the fire reaching nearer town. It was a grand sight, but too close for comfort. It is of the utmost importance that all the sagebrush immediately adjoining town should be grubbed up as a fire may start in it at any time, and with a strong wind blowing nothing could save the town from destruction. A sagebrush fire spreads with amazing rapidity and a timely removal of all the brush in close proximity to town should at once be effected.

Chamberlain's Colic, Cholera and Diarrhœa Remedy is the standard. Its many cures have won it praise from Maine to California. Every family and every traveler should be provided with it at all times. No other remedy can take its place or do its work. 25 and 50 cent bottles for sale by

ALIAS SUMMONS.

IN THE JUSTICE'S COURT OF THIRD Township, County of Inyo, State of California.

JOHN WELCH, Plaintiff, vs. JESUS ENSENAS, Defendant.

The people of the State of California send greeting to Jesus Eusenas, Defendant:

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above-named Plaintiff in the Justice's Court of Third Township, County of Inyo, State of California, and to answer before the Justice at his office in said Township, the Complaint filed therein, within five days (exclusive of the day of service), after the service on you of this Summons—if served within the Township in which this action is brought, or, if served out of said Township, but in said County, within ten days; or within twenty days if served elsewhere.

The said action is brought to obtain judgment against you for the sum of $38.60 alleged to be due plaintiff upon an account for work, labor and services performed by one J. W. Murphy in the line of general blacksmith work and for materials furnished you in and about said work at your request, between the 26th day of August, 1890, and the 3rd day of May, 1892, and which said account was assigned to plaintiff herein on the 5th day of July, 1892, and before the commencement of this action, as more fully appears by the complaint on file herein, to which you are referred.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, said plaintiff will take judgment against you for the sum of $38.60, together with costs of suit.

Given under my hand this 12th day of July, 1892. IRV. H. MULHOLLAND,
Justice of the Peace of said Township.
F. E. DENSMORE, Attorney for Plaintiff.

"August Flower"

"What is August Flower for?" As easily answered as asked. It is for Dyspepsia. It is a special remedy for the Stomach and Liver.—Nothing more than this. We believe August Flower cures Dyspepsia. We know it will. We have reasons for knowing it. To-day it has an honored place in every town and country store, possesses one of the largest manufacturing plants in the country, and sells everywhere. The reason is simple. It does one thing, and does it right. It cures dyspepsia.

I CURE FITS!

When I say cure I do not mean merely to stop them for a time and then have them return again. I mean a radical cure. I have made the disease of FITS, EPILEPSY or FALLING SICKNESS a life-long study. I warrant my remedy to cure the worst cases. Because others have failed is no reason for not now receiving a cure. Send at once for a treatise and a Free Bottle of my infallible remedy. A Business Man's Literary Education.

Capt. Ed H. Webster, of Kansas City, is a hustler and has been from his youth up. There are few men, however, who have at ready command so much general information on literary matters. Knowing that he began at a high pressure speed when he was a boy in Indiana, that he was a captain in the army when he was 18 years old, and that he has been on the pace that kills most people ever since, I asked him one day when he found time to read and how he had obtained so much information.

He said: By reading on my business trips. I always take a book or several books with me when I go away from home, no matter whether the journey is long or short. Sometimes I take notes of what I read. I never throw a book away. I never get my hands on a book that I do not examine the contents. It is an old saying, but a true one, that every book contains something worth knowing.

Not long ago I made a short run out of town and forgot to take a book. I didn't forget it, but I had no time. At a station down the road, where the engine stopped to water, I got out of the coach for a rest. I picked up a piece of a magazine on the roadside. The cover was gone, and in the section I had there was nothing to indicate the waif's name or whence it came. I took it to my seat and began on it. There were not more than eight or ten pages. But out of those pages I gleaned so much that I was astounded. I made notes of the information which I had literally picked up, and that little trip will always be a pleasant one in my recollection.—Chicago Tribune.

Two Million Plants.

The chief gardener of the city—he has about 400 other gardeners under his instructions—tells me that the total number of plants employed for the toilet of Paris is about 2,000,000. The nurseries which produce them are situated in various parts of the city. In the Bois de Boulogne, near the racecourse of Longchamps, are the nursery grounds of trees with caduceus leaves. At Auteuil, on the borders of the Boulogne route, in a sandy soil excellent for their propagation, are placed a collection of resinous trees, plants with persistent leaves and heath-mold plants; on the banks of the river Marne, at a village called Petit-Buy, the plane trees that are planted along the boulevards of Paris are cultivated, and finally, out at Vincennes, near the Reuilly barrier, just beyond the fortifications, a large assignment of land is reserved for ornamental plants.—Paris Letter.

The Precocity of Mozart.

An example of precocity was the composer Mozart. In his 4th year he played the piano well. In his 5th year he composed several pieces. When he was 6 years old his father took him on concert tours, when he astonished all who heard him by his skill on the piano and the violin. At the age of 7 he astonished all Paris by his compositions as well as by his performances on various instruments. At this time he published some sonatas for piano and violin, and in the following year he composed his first symphonies. At the age of 12 he composed an opera. He became a very great musician, but, after all, he is not generally rated higher by the musical world than Richard Wagner, who did not devote himself to music until he was 16, and composed nothing worth speaking of until he was 20.—New York Ledger.

Musical Kites.

Musical kites are provided with a bamboo resonator containing three apertures, one in the center and one at each extremity. When the kite is flying the air, in rushing into the resonator, produces a somewhat intense and plaintive sound, which can be heard at a great distance. The transverse rods of the frame of this kite are connected at the extremities, and give the kite the aspect of two birds' wings affixed to a central axis.

This kite sometimes reaches large dimensions—say, ten feet in width. There are often three or four resonators, placed one above another over the kite, and in this case a very pronounced, grave sound is produced. The musical kite is very common in China and Tonquin; hundreds of them are sometimes seen hovering in the air in the vicinity of Hanoi. It is believed among the superstitious to have the power of charming evil spirits away, and with this object it is often tied to the roofs of houses during the prevalence of winds, where, during the whole night, it emits plaintive murmurs after the manner of an Æolian harp.—New York Telegram.

To Preserve Textile Fabrics.

A Belgian chemist has discovered a means for rendering fabrics, no matter how delicate in texture or color, proof against the ravages of decay. The wonderful state of preservation which the head bands of the Egyptian mummies exhibit is due to their having been impregnated with a kind of resin. This led the inventor to make certain experiments with the substance extracted from birch bark, to which the peculiar aroma of Russian leather is due, and he found out that the green tar which was left over after the oil used in tanning had been extracted from the white bark of the birch tree yields neither acid nor alkaloid, and that in solution with alcohol it forms a liquid of remarkable fluidity with the power of resisting, when once dried, even the action of alcohol itself. This substance will, it is said, unite with the most delicate and brilliant colors, and render them imperishable.—Textile Manufacturer.

LAST WORDS OF GREAT MEN.

How Many of Them Were Actually Spoken by Their Reputed Authors?

An intensely interesting volume might be made up of the dying words and speeches of men whom the world calls famous. Their final exits from the great stage have been generally edifying and always characteristic.

"God be praised," exclaimed Wolfe, the hero of Quebec, on learning that the French were giving way in every direction, "I die happy." His antagonist, Montcalm, also received a mortal wound while endeavoring to rally his men, and when told that his end was approaching made answer: "So much the better; I shall not live to see the surrender of Quebec."

"I pray thee, see me up safe, but for the coming down I can shift for myself," remarked Sir Thomas More, observing the weakness of the scaffold.

"I heard say the executioner was very good, and I have a little neck," said Anne Boleyn, putting her hands about it and laughing heartily.

The unhappy Charles I expired with the word "Remember" on his lips, and the last words attributed "Buckshot" Forster were "No home rule," while Rabelais calmly remarked: "Drop the curtain, the farce is played out."

With some a presentiment that they are about to die is the first symptoms of approaching death. Mozart wrote his requiem under the conviction that the monument he was erecting to his genius would prove a monument to his own remains. When life was ebbing fast he called for the score, and as he mused over it, he said: "Did I not tell you truly that it was for myself that I composed this death chant?" Bewick, the famous wood engraver, was last employed upon a representation of "The old horse waiting for death," and Hogarth delineated the death of all things, and having given it a last touch, seized his palette and broke it in pieces, remarking: "I have finished."

Many remarkable instances may also be cited in which the dying lips murmur out the names of friends and the occupations and recollections of past life. Goethe's dying lips murmured something about a beautiful woman's face, and Napoleon's last thoughts were for the head of the army, while Disraeli, some quarter of an hour before his death, raised himself a little in his bed, and stretched himself out in the old familiar way that he was wont when rising to reply in debate, while his lips moved in silence.

De Lagny, the great mathematician, was asked the square of twelve when he was no longer able to recognize his friends about his bed, and mechanically answered "144." No less striking were the last words of Lord Tenterden, the famous English judge. Some time before his death he had been delirious and talking incoherently, but presently recovering his composure and raising himself from his pillow, he was heard to say, in slow and solemn tones, as when he used to conclude his summing up in cases of great importance: "And now, gentlemen of the jury, you will consider your verdict."

Sometimes the strained thread breaks with a sudden snap. It was in this way that Boileau expired from the effects of dropsy. A friend entered the room where he was sitting, and the poet, in one and the same breath, bid him hail and farewell. "Good day and adieu," said he; "it will be a very long adieu," and instantly expired.—Once a Week.

A Woman's Way.

"My husband doesn't chew any more tobacco," said a newly married lady to a number of friends, "or, at least he doesn't where I can see him."

"How did you stop him?" they all asked.

"The morning after we were married," began the lady, "and he and I were sitting on the front porch, I noticed he was ill at ease, and finally I asked him what was the matter with him."

"My darling," he said, taking my hands, "there is something I should have told you before we were married."

"What is it?" I gasped, as the vision of another woman swept over me.

"Love," he answered, "I am an inveterate tobacco chewer. Can you, will you forgive me?"

As he finished, I slipped my hand from his, and drawing out a box of snuff and a brush, I said:

"Oh, John, I'm so glad you spoke of it, for I'm nearly crazy for a 'dip.'"

"His face was a picture, I can tell you, and in less than three minutes we had entered into a solemn compact to forever abstain from the weed."

"And did you really use snuff before you were married?" asked one of the ladies.

"No," answered the wife, "but I was fixed for John."—Atlanta Constitution.

Strange Crabs.

In Bermuda the soldier crab carries heavy shells up the hills to puzzle future geologists. Another specie climbs the mangrove trees. A shore crab in the Cape Verde Island may "be seen running along like a piece of paper blown by a strong wind." In Ascension Island there are crabs which "climb up to the top of Green mountain, and the larger ones steal the young rabbits from their holes and devour them." The famous robber crab of the Philippines, that cracks and eats cocoanuts, is itself routed out of its hole and feasted on by the wild swine.—Edinburgh Review.

How to Blush to Order.

A new blush has been invented by some ingenious individual. It can be laid on half an hour or so before it is required to act, and can be set, like an alarm clock, to go off, or, rather, to come on, at a certain time. This is a dangerous and effective weapon to place in the armory of a beauty whose natural blushes are of the past, but the resources of science are, apparently, unfathomable. A new toilet powder is announced in the same category which "defies perspiration." If this be true the remarkable invention may also be said to defy hygiene.—London Daily News.

A Large Contract.

Messenger boy (from the foundry)—Here's a box of type the boss sent up.

Reporter—Put it out on the vacant stair—here, not that one—next door, that vacant stare belongs to the city editor. You can't fill that up, my boy; besides we want something to sit on.—Van Dorn's.

Several Excellent Sentiments.

In an uptown boarding school, where the methods of instruction are more practical than fashionable, the following rule hangs high in letters a foot long: "Avoid sarcasm." In the same school it is considered "a sin to fret" and "vulgar to gossip."—New York World.

MEN OF OAKLAND.

THEIR WORDS ARE ABOVE REPROACH.

An Interview With Some Well Known Citizens Brings Out Certain Facts of the Greatest Interest and Importance.

The interviews which follow are from people well known in Oakland and the reader can be assured that every word they say is true. They are certainly most remarkable assertions, and coming as they do just at the present time, they can be read with the greatest interest and profit by all.

George H. Fogg, the well known notary public of 1471 Broadway in the course of a conversation stated these facts: "About five or six years ago I was suffering from a disease of the kidneys which troubled me for a year or so before I discovered what the real cause of my discomfort was. Upon the recommendation of a friend I began taking Warner's Safe Cure and took three or four bottles. It helped me immediately. I spoke of it to friends of mine at the time and many of them have used it with benefit. I still recommend it at every opportunity. Since using the medicine I have had no return of the trouble thought that was some three or four years ago."

"Can you give me the name of any of your friends who have been helped by this remedy?"

"Yes, if you will see Mr. Geo. S. Naismith, the insurance man of 463 Ninth street he will tell you more about it. He took it because he saw my name indorsing it."

Mr. Naismith is well known to the business and social circles of Oakland. He greeted the reporter cordially and said:

"Five years ago I was confined to my bed and the doctors gave me up to die but I am now up and able to attend to my business. Warner's Safe Cure is a great remedy and in my case acted upon my system at once and completely restored me to health."

Mr. B. F. Armstrong senior partner in the well known paint house of Armstrong & Merchant, 46 Third street, San Francisco and whose Oakland home is at 1520 Broadway, said:

"Warner's Safe Cure saved my life and my wife's. I had kidney trouble so bad that I did'nt know a moment's peace while my wife was a martyr to those special troubles peculiar to women. We were induced by our friends to try the Safe Cure and it has completely restored us to health. Now we always keep it in the house and use it as a family medicine and would not be without it for any consideration."

Mrs. Armstrong was also seen at her Oakland home and fully bore out her husband's statements as to her recovery being remarkably strong and healthful in appearance.

George W. Baker is a painter by trade and lives in a neat little cottage at Barryman Station just beyond Berkeley. In answer to our reporter he said:

"Five years ago I had dyspepsia so bad that I did not know what it was to enjoy a meal. I got in such a condition that everything distressed me fearfully and at times I would be seized with pains in my chest and abdomen so severe that I fell to the ground as though my backbone were suddenly severed with an axe. Well do I know what it is to be stricken down in the street and have to be carried home in agony. This went on for over a year and all the while I was trying to find some doctor who could help me but without success. I spent hundreds of dollars and was no better than at first when one day I saw an advertisement of Warner's Safe Cure. It was a big poster on a fence and I tell you sir, I thank God to-day for the man that put it there. Almost in despair I bought a bottle but by the time that was gone I was eating heartily of anything I desired. The second bottle cured me and I don't think I finished it either."

Frederick A. Wilder, the genial proprietor of the Windsor House was seen at his hotel at the corner of Washingtan and Ninth streets. Mr. Wilder has spent considerable time in Arizona and the southern country and spoke of his experience as follows:

"In 1883 I was in Arizona on business and while there I contracted a severe cold which settled in my kidneys. The bad water of that part of the country aggravated my trouble till I had a well developed case of Bright's disease. I tried different remedies with but slightly beneficial results until last December. At that time I was attacked with the Grip which left me with my kidneys in a very weak condition and also brought on inflammation of the bladder. I began using Warner's Safe Cure and am now on the fourth bottle. It is a fine thing and has done me a world of good. The pain has disappeared from my bladder and the weak feeling from across my hips. I heartily indorse the remedy and am still using it."

Albert Rowe of the Pacific Borax Works, Oakland, in a recent conversation said: "I have had kidney trouble with nervousness and loss of sleep for years. Nothing seemed to help me in the least till I tried Warner's Safe Cure. I have taken about a dozen and a half of the remedy and now my nerves are steady and I sleep like a top."

Judge E. O. Crosby, the well known attorney of 1622 Park street, Alameda said: "Continual office work and sedentary habits brought on me a severe attack of kidney trouble with sleeplessness and weakness across the small of my back. I began taking Warner's Safe Cure and found immediate improvement. I took about fifty bottles and at the end of that time was perfectly well."

The above statements are not from obscure people living in the Eastern States, but from well known persons residing right here in Oakland where the truth of their assertions can be easily verified. Such testimony ought to be convincing.—Oakland Tribune.

The Perfection of Politeness.

The perfection of politeness is well illustrated by an anecdote told by Mr. Lear in his "Journey of a Landscape Painter in the East." He was taking a parting cup of coffee with the postmaster of Pella, when he had the misfortune to set his foot on a handsome pipe bowl. Crash went the bowl; the Mohammedan sat unmoved. Mr. Lear apologized. "The breaking of such a pipe bowl," said the postmaster, "would, indeed, under ordinary circumstances, be disagreeable; but in a friend every action has its charms."

Those Beautiful Eyes.

The maire of a town on the frontier had, in accordance with the recent regulations, to make out a passport for a rich and highly respectable lady of his acquaintance, who, in spite of a slight disfigurement, was very vain of her personal appearance. His native politeness prompted him to gloss over the defect, and, after a moment's reflection, he wrote among the items of personal description: "Eyes dark, beautiful, tender, expressive; but one of them missing."—Figaro.

Frankly Put.

The guests, but possibly not the host, at a dinner given recently were greatly amused by the innocent mistake of the little daughter of one of the company. When 4-year-old Rosalie, having tried her knife and fork on the roast beef, passed her plate to her father, he received it in discreet silence; but the host, Rosalie's uncle, said quizzically: "Why, Rosalie! Aren't you big enough to cut your meat?"

"Yes, sir," she replied, putting into form the thought which her grown up fellow diners were too polite to utter, "I am big enough at home, but this meat is so tough I can't cut it."—Youth's Companion.

Booth Off the Stage.

Mr. Booth is not a social man in the sense that term is applied to such men as Chauncey M. Depew or Mr. Whitney. He is not a social man in the sense that Mr. Irving is social. Mr. Booth is a reserve force. He comes to the theatre in a carriage accompanied by his valet. From his carriage to his dressing room, from the dressing room to the parts he plays, back to his dressing room, where he remains until his cue, and then, after the play, to the hotel with his valet, and then to bed—is the routine of this most distinguished American actor.

The Best Natural Dentifrice.

Strawberries preserve and beautify the teeth, says Medical Classics. In fact, ripe strawberries are about the very best natural dentifrice known. Besides possessing singular power in whitening and cleaning the teeth, and rapidly removing tartar, they impart an agreeable fragrance to the breath. They may be rubbed on the teeth with the finger or applied with the brush. Oranges and strawberries are also useful in removing fur from the tongue.

The difference between a brooch and lacepin, which a great many people do not understand, is that a brooch should be almost as long as it is broad; oftenest it is round or square, but this is not absolutely a necessity. A lacepin must at least be mounted on a long pin, if the jeweled part itself is not long and narrow.

The wife of Count Tolstoi is a handsome woman of 46, and the mother of thirteen children. She is young looking, bright and cheerful.

MURDERED BY PREJUDICE.

Thousands of men die every day who might be saved. Prejudice has murdered many a man and woman. If it were believed that the sum of disease could be reduced by physic, much would be gained. The nightmare of death would not frighten us as it does. In our modern civilization we ought reasonably to expect disease to settle upon us because we do so much to attract it; because we so often and so steadily expose ourselves to it. At the same time we all ought to understand, as a part of our rudimentary education, that to save ourselves from the effects of such exposure some kind of fortification should be built around our vital forces lest the enemy carry us, as it were, by a sudden onslaught. For many years the unprejudiced have used BRANDRETH'S PILLS in this way and they have proved a most effective wall against the approach of disease.

ACROSS THE DEEP, TO THE FAR WEST,

On steamboats, cars and stage-coaches, Hostetter's Stomach Bitters is carried as the most important item in the materia medica of the traveling public. It deprives vitiated, brackish water of its hurtful properties and execrable flavor, counteracts the pernicious effects upon the stomach of bad or indigestible food, remedies cramps, heartburn and wind upon the stomach. It is a fine defense against malarial disorders, nullifies the effects of excessive heat, cold and damp, relieves sick headaches, and is an incomparable cure for costiveness and biliousness. The fatigue of travel often tells most disastrously upon invalids and convalescents, occasionally to such an extent as to jeopardise life. Persons in feeble health, apprehensive of bad effects from travel, will, if provided with the Bitters, be far less likely to have their fears realized.

DEAFNESS CAN'T BE CURED

by local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure Deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube gets inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed Deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

The wrong way, with Catarrh, is to stop it without curing it. The poisonous, irritating snuffs, strong caustic solutions, "creams," balms and the like may, perhaps, palliate for a time. But they may drive the disease to the lungs. The wrong way is full of danger.

The right way is a proved one. It's with Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy. It cures, perfectly and permanently, by its mild, soothing, cleansing and healing properties, the worst cases of Chronic Catarrh. It has proved itself right, thousands of times, when everything else has failed.

And this makes its proprietors willing to prove that it's the right thing for you, no matter how bad your case or of how long standing.

If they can't cure your Catarrh, they'll pay you $500 in cash.

They mean it.

They're certain of their medicine.

THE REST IS SILENCE.

When the loved voice is heard no more
Whose falling tones were doubly dear,
There falls upon the listening ear
A silence never felt before.

It is not that the senses strain
To catch a sound they may not hear;
It is the grieving spirit's ear
That longs and listens still in vain.

And, lo! this silence, sudden grown,
Threads every cry of joy or fear;
All wonted sounds that greet the ear
Break with a wailing undertone.
—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

A PHYSICIAN'S STORY.

An old physician in Atlanta told me a strange story the other day about a young couple who lived in the city some twenty-five years ago.

Talk of fiction, he said, his fine eyes beaming thoughtfully, I have known stories in real life that, should I give them to the world in print, they would be considered the wild, sensational fancies of a madman's brain.

Many years ago I was summoned one evening to a handsome residence in the upper part of Whitehall street—the street then most popular for residences. The mistress of the house had been a wife three years. I knew the circumstances of her marriage and the history of her whole inner life. She was at the time of her marriage in love with a man who was separated but not divorced from his wife, the laws of the Roman Catholic church, to which he belonged, forbidding divorce.

She married her husband because she was poor and dependent, and in those days there seemed little else for a woman to do but marry when she grew up.

The husband was a man of some means, but a dissipated reprobate, an opium eater and drunkard, and there had been sad stories about the wife's wretchedness and the husband's brutality since the marriage.

As I entered the hallway there was an ominous, uneasy look about the servants who met me. The old negro nurse, who had cared for the young woman since her childhood, looked ashy with terror as she whispered:

"Come up stairs, doctor. I think my chile done dead dis time, but I b'l'eve you ken bring her to life."
